WORK SMARTER — NOT HARDER

By BERNICE STRAWN
Oregon State University

"Attitudes are like petticoats, it's easy to see when another person's are showing, but not your own." This is what Mrs. Roberta Frasier, extension family life specialist told 783 Oregon women who gathered at Oregon State university for the annual meeting of the home economics extension council.

Theme of the conference was "Attitudes and the Future." Mrs. Frasier emphasized that attitudes determine both your immediate and long-range future.

Those who say "The good old days were better," "It won't work," "I'm too old to change," are putting a damper on their futures. Their attitudes are showing, she says. Attitudes are as important as eyes in the way you see things.

"I've used brand X detergent for years and love it. But this year when I washed my living room curtains with it, they came out in shreds. What's happened to Brand X?"

Your curtains are now a year older and have been exposed to the sun. We are quite sure the detergent is not at fault. Old curtains often go to pieces all of a sudden when washed.

Watch for "specials" on frozen strawberries from last year's pack. It's smart to buy these for making jam. You'll save money, also time from tedious stemming and sorting.

Soft and loose, one size fits all, whether it is draped into a strapless patio dress or skirt or worn unbelted as a bathing-sleeved beach coat. Silhouette interest is highlighted in each of these versions.

Suggestions Made for Wedding Arrangements

By MARGERY McELHENY

Chicago — UPB — The divorcee or widow who marries for the second time often faces many taboos.

Take the matter of the white dress. It's not true that white is improper for a second wedding, say etiquette experts. The custom of a white dress has its origins in economics.

In early Saxon days, the poorer bride dressed in a plain white robe to show that she brought nothing with her to her marriage. This indicated that her husband was not responsible for her debts.

Although there is no restriction against wearing white, the bride's choice should be based on comfort. If she feels more comfortable in an off-white shade or pastel she can select beige, pink, blue, green or whatever is most becoming.

A veil symbolizes maidenhood, and is taboo for a second marriage. So is a formal gown with a train, since a formal wedding with many attendants is not in keeping with a second marriage.

The gown should be ballerina or street length, and instead of a veil, a small flower hat, a cap or a head dress complementing the gown may be worn.

The style of the gown is determined by the time of day of the wedding, but shoulder and upper arms should be covered. If the bride wears an after-five or dinner dress, the maid of honor and bridesmaids should dress accordingly.

It is better to wear a suit or simple street dress if the wedding takes place at the pastor's home, say the experts.

Invitations

The choice of engraved or hand-written invitations is governed by the number of invited guests. Hand-written invitations are correct for weddings of 50 guests or less. If more than 50 guests are invited, engraved invitations may be sent.

The invitation should carry the bride's full name, including her given name, maiden name and name by a previous marriage.

Guests are not obliged to present a gift to the previously married bride, but most will.

If you have been a widow or a divorcee for a long time, you may invite to the wedding both families as well as close friends on both sides.

Etiquette does not determine whether children of a first marriage should be present for the second wedding. The choice is up to the engaged couple.

Whether the children directly participate depends on the type of ceremony. Since the wedding will be informal, there will be no flower girls or ring bearers. However, the daughter of the bride may be her mother's attendant.
