Conference on World Peace Through Law Set

By United Press International For centuries, lawyers have built rules of law within nations. Now why can't they build them between nations? Starry-eyed idealism? An empty and impractical dream? Not so, think many of the world's lawyers. From June 30 to July 6, in Athens, Greece, some 200 delegate lawyers will set their sights on "the mobilization of the world's lawyers to promote world peace."

What is to be done, Rhyne said, is to begin the same kind of "built-up" in international law as has been done in science. "If we could spend only a comparatively small share of the amount that now goes to scientific activity on international law research, we would experience a law build-up of tremendous proportions."

Modern science, he asserted, has a virtual monopoly on the enthusiasm, imagination and the financial support of people and governments. "We lawyers must break that monopoly," he said. "Man must master science or it will destroy us all. And the only way we can do that is through law—international law." What is to be done, Rhyne said, is to begin the same kind of "built-up" in international law as has been done in science. "If we could spend only a comparatively small share of the amount that now goes to scientific activity on international law research, we would experience a law build-up of tremendous proportions."

Specifically, the delegates will discuss how to make the world court at The Hague more effective. In the past 18 years it has disposed of only 13 cases and, despite its impressive reputation for judicial competence and integrity, the result has been called "The case of the empty courtroom."

Suggestions to be considered include: Acceptance by more nations of the unconditional jurisdiction of the court; sitting in regional chambers on each continent for greater accessibility and lower costs; use of the court by individuals, groups and corporations as well as nations; and moving of the court to the United Nations in New York for part of each year.

The delegates also will discuss the "international law of outer space and will consider designating a World Law day and a possible World Rule of Law year during which the lawyers would seek advances in knowledge and cooperation in international law comparable to those achieved in science during the International Geophysical year (IGY)."

U.S. Food Surplus Not Adequate for World's Shortages

By LEROY HANSEN United Press International

Washington—UPI—More than half the world's three billion population goes to bed hungry every night. Daily, 10,000 persons die of starvation or malnutrition.

Item: Billions of bushels of wheat, barley, rye, corn and other food grains are stored unused in granaries of the United States.

Question: Why does not the United States simply give its surpluses outright to the hungry of the world?

Answer: This would be nearly impossible to achieve. And if it could be done, it would provide only short-term relief.

Fact Stated Clearly - President Kennedy stated this fact clearly in an address to the recent World Food Congress here. He said:

"All our stored abundance, even if it could be distributed evenly to all the undernourished of the world, would provide a balanced diet for less than one month. And many nations lack the necessary storage, transportation and distribution facilities."

Even if the United States decided today to give away all its stored food, nearly insurmountable difficulties stand in the way. Among them:

Distribution: Just getting the food to those who need it would be a highly difficult task. As Kennedy pointed out, many nations do not have the storage and transportation facilities. Even in the United States and one of the most sophisticated cities in the world, welfare officials have run into trouble trying to get relief foods to the poor.

Eating habits: Many people of the world are inhibited by traditional eating habits from using food that would give them nourishment.

International trade: If the United States were to unload its surpluses, it would be greeted by cries of anguish from other grain exporters of the world and with charges of "dumping." It would most likely upset the world trade pattern.

National pride: Few nations would be likely to accept an outright gift from the United States even if it meant helping its needy. National pride is a factor, particularly in developing nations.

The basic problem is that world food production has not kept up with the world population explosion.

Although the United States cannot give its food away, it is doing a tremendous job in feeding the world hungry through its "Food for Peace" program.

It has been estimated that U.S. food shipments to other nations have totaled more than three 10,000-ton shipments per day for eight and a half years.

Ships Surplus Food - From July, 1954, through December, 1962, the United States has shipped 102 million tons of surplus agricultural products worth more than $12 billion to 114 nations. Shipments from July last year to May this year alone totaled 11,844,000 metric tons.

India received $1.8 billion through 1962 in surplus U.S. agricultural products. Pakistan received $374.7 million, Korea $246.1 million, Viet Nam $111.6 million, Indonesia $206.3 million and Japan $169.8 million.

These foods are provided under U.S. Public Law 480. They are either sold for local currency, sold for dollars on long-term credit terms, donated through voluntary agencies, or given in emergency relief.

To Needy Nations - The greatest percentage is sold, at world market prices, to needy nations in their own currency. Most of the local currency received is then turned back to the government of the purchasing country as loans or grants for economic development.

But the U.S. Food for Peace program is not the answer to world hunger, President Kennedy said in his address. He added:

"As long as freedom from hunger is only half achieved - so long as two-thirds of the nations of the world have food deficits - no citizen, no nation can afford to feel satisfied or secure. We have the ability, we have the means, and we have the capacity to eliminate hunger from the face of the earth. We need only the will."
