The fact a community split by controversy can unite behind a common cause in time of need was demonstrated to Mr. and Mrs. Charles Capello of Butte Falls last week. The family home burned Wednesday night while no one was home, and most of the house and the family's belongings were lost.

But as news of the loss spread, persons from both sides involved in the controversy came to their aid. Mrs. Capello told us, visibly impressed by what had happened. Some townspeople took their son John, who had cut his hands in the mishap, to a hospital. Others measured the family for clothes and proceeded to make new garments. Various organizations and individuals in the community donated materials, food and money.

Dallas and Peggy Purcell of the Trausman sanctuary invite their friends and anyone else interested to join them for their annual Fourth of July picnic Thursday. It's a potluck type of meal, with lunch starting at about noon, but visitors are encouraged to come early and stay late.

A white back the Jacksonville City Council talked over a proposed ordinance against riding bicycles on sidewalks in the city. The councilmen didn't pass it. But now some research has established that such an ordinance was on the books all along. It was enacted in 1951. Frank Carter, police chief in Jacksonville, will start enforcing the "new" law this week.

Happy Camp Mill To Reopen Shortly With New Machinery

By HAZEL DAVIS
Mail Tribune Correspondent
Happy Camp - Josephine Plywood corporation of Happy Camp has been shut down since May 8 in order to install new machinery and to clean the log pond, according to Victor Dusenberry, mill manager. Plans are for the mill to start up shortly, probably about July 8.

A new block-lift has been installed to bring blocks up from the pond to a new block-barker which is some of the latest equipment available and operates automatically. The new lathe charger, also installed, picks up blocks automatically with instant pickup putting the block into the lathe and back into position for the next block. All this equipment works at a very fast speed, Dusenberry said.

The new machinery should increase production, at the same time reduce the cost of manufacturing to keep up with other building materials on the market, Dusenberry said. It also is a safety measure to keep two men from working in a dangerous spot. The automatic equipment will not mean that these two men will be laid off, however. They will be given work elsewhere in the mill, he said.

The average cut at the mill per shift is estimated at 50 thousand board feet of logs, and with the new machinery it is hoped that production will increase to 65 or 70 thousand board feet per shift.

During the shut-down, the 9½-acre pond was drained for the first time in nine years to recover "sinks" and to deepen the area where logs are dumped. The logs are banded together on the trucks and are dumped still banded together into the pond so as to make it possible to store more logs at one time.

According to Dusenberry, there are more logs under the water than there are visible on top of the water. The average depth of the pond is 10 feet in most places and
