

Legislation Would Increase Prices on Most Retail Items

Washington—(UPI)—Chances are about even that Congress will enact a bill that would force many retailers to boost prices on a wide array of consumer goods.

The legislation—hailed as a boon to the small retailer and assailed as a multi-billion-dollar blow to consumers—is designed to curb price-cutting at both the wholesale and retail level.

Supporters have dubbed it the "Quality Stabilization Act." Foes insist that is deceptive labeling. They call it "price-fixing."

Chairman Oren Harris (D-Ark.), chief sponsor of the bill, had no trouble steering the legislation through his House Commerce Committee last week despite opposition of Kennedy administration officials, the AFL-CIO and major farm organizations, and witnesses who claimed to speak for the nation's consumers and for its "senior citizens."

Pressure Intense
The pressure for the bill's enactment is intense. It comes from a powerful and well-organized lobby that has "grass roots" planted firmly in corner drug stores in cities and towns throughout the country.

Independent retail druggists are spearheading the drive, which is supported by many jewelers and hardware and appliance dealers and retailers of clothing and sporting goods. They contend there out to be a law to protect them from price-cutting by chain stores, discount houses, department stores and other competitors.

The bill would empower a manufacturer to set minimum prices throughout the country at which any of his products bearing a "name, brand or trademark" could be wholesaled or retailed.

Any product from automobiles to toothpaste to canned soups could be covered with one exception. The bill does not cover those drugs which, by law, must be sold through a doctor's prescription.

Would Continue Lure
Should the bill become law, manufacturers would be under pressure from independent retail outlets to use the authority to halt competitive price-cutting. Then, anyone who sold below the minimum price could be barred by court order from future sales of that particular name-brand, or trademarked, merchandise.

Assistant Atty. Gen. Lee

Loevinger testified that the history of this kind of retail price maintenance under state "fair trade laws" shows that it does not actually help small business. He argued that big stores would continue to lure customers by advertising private brands at "sensationally" low prices.

"Once attracted into the chain store by advertising," he said, "the patron knows that the prices on branded products are the same as those offered elsewhere. Consequently, there is no inducement... to shop around. The result is that the chain stores and the big business retailers increase their market share of both branded and unbranded merchandise."

The coverage of state "fair trade" laws—which once extended through almost all of the country—has receded to about 25 states as a result of successful attacks in state legislatures and state courts. That is why Congress is being asked to intervene with a nation-wide law.

Covers Every State
The bill approved by the committee would cover every state, but would allow states to gain exemption within their borders by enacting a state law to that effect.

Although there may be some foot-dragging, neither the House Rules Committee nor the Democratic leadership is likely to block House action indefinitely. Consequently, foes concede House passage but hope the bill somehow can be bottled up in the Senate until the 88th Congress adjourns next year.

Failing that, they will urge President Kennedy to brave the election year wrath of druggists and other retailers by vetoing it.

Try and Stop Me
By BENNETT CERF
IN CHARLES PRICE'S superb book, "The World of Golf," he tells of what must be the most casual player in the history of the sport. His name is J. Wood Platt, and on the notoriously tough Pine Valley course outside Philadelphia, he began one unbelievable round with a birdie on the first hole, an eagle on the second, a hole in one on the third, and another birdie on the fourth. This left him six under par for four holes—a score probably never matched. What did Mr. Platt do at this point? He decided he had played enough that day, handed his bag of clubs to his caddie, and went to the clubhouse for a game of bridge!

...ONE BIRDIE...
...AN EAGLE...

A sedate couple in Indianapolis were upset when their carefully brought-up daughter enlisted in the Peace Corps and was assigned a post in darkest Africa. Her first letter home from that remote spot was not exactly reassuring. It began, "The people here, I must admit, are hostile, stupid, and dull. So much for the staff. Now let me tell you about the natives..."
