

Forests Face Serious Threat

Portland—(UPI)—The Pacific Northwest faces its worst forest fire threat in history because of last year's Columbus Day storm, it was emphasized Monday.

Federal, state and private forest protection officials from Oregon and Washington met here to discuss the problem.

Dwight Phipps and Michael Webster, state foresters from Oregon and Washington, respectively, said the wind storm blew down enough lumber to rebuild every house in the two states.

They said a slash fire could result in a holocaust so big the San Francisco and Chicago fires would seem like match flames.

The storm knocked down between 9 and 10 billion board feet in Oregon and 4.4 billion board feet in Washington, the officials were told by Phipps and Webster.

Phipps said Oregon will have to double the acreage normally closed to recreation if hot weather develops this summer. That would mean closure of about a million acres.
