Injured Climbers Said Recovering

Hood River - UPI - Three climbers who fell about 1,500 feet onto Eliot Glacier on Mt. Hood Sunday were recovering today in Memorial hospital here.

Hospital attendants listed Dr. Mark Hanchka, Dr. Eberhard H. Gloeckler and Robert C. Shoemaker Jr., all of Portland, in satisfactory condition.

They suffered multiple injuries, but none considered critical, the hospital said.

The climbers fell while descending the mountain's northeast slope. Winds estimated at from 40 to 60 miles an hour sent boulders crashing past the fallen men.

Rescue efforts of the Crag Rats and Alpines from Hood River and Mazamas from Portland, along with forestry employees and other mountaineers, were begun about noon, but blowing sand, hail and finally fog delayed the work. It was about 9:20 p.m. before a sled carrying Dr. Hanchka began inching down the mountain.

Dr. Gloeckler was able to walk part of the way and overtook the other party. Shoemaker was brought off the glacier about two hours later.

Portland Negro Objects To Rules - Samuel Macon, a Negro student at Lewis and Clark college here who was offered a job with the Portland Park Bureau after claiming discrimination, may not report to work.

Howard Lonergan, his attorney, made the disclosure Monday night after Macon failed to appear for work at the bureau's recreation division office in the morning.

Lonergan said the City Council had set employment restrictions in the hiring of Macon, including one that he be "strictly watched." The attorney said he had sent a letter of protest to the council.

"Not until these restrictions are removed will Macon report to his job," Lonergan said. Macon was offered the job as a recreation leader after claiming discrimination when his application was rejected.

A spokesman for the park bureau said the question of whether the job still is open to Macon if he reports later is a recreation division decision.
