Small Worlds Around Us

By LYNN M. WATKINS
(Register and Tribune Syndicate, 1963)

At First Glance Sheep Appear To Be All Alike

With their woolly faces stuck through the gap in the gate they looked as stupid as they are supposed to be. "As alike" their owner said, "as peas in a pod."

There were six sheep, looking dumbly at us, all with a vacant and expressionless look on their faces; six out of a flock of about fifty, owned by the man who stood alongside us, looking into those six calm faces.

"As alike as peas in a pod" the man had said; we had heard the same expression many times before. Because we had, we once examined the peas in many pods and surprisingly enough we discovered they were never exactly alike. Every pea was a little different from any other pea, even when in the same green capsule.

Peas Never Alike
So, peas are never alike. Why shouldn't sheep be different from one another? We decided to find out, or at least try. The man gave us permission to study his sheep, and laughed when he did. He probably thought we were as dumb as the animals we wished to observe.

We caught an even dozen sheep, put them in a small enclosure where we could study each one individually at our leisure. We looked them over, and they looked at us. We peered intently into those sheepish faces. Admittedly, they so closely resembled each other as to be identical. So we broke up the set; we isolated just half the group, six in all, and began again, trying to view the quiet animals with an unprejudiced mind. Carefully we compared one with another. We began to notice a difference.

No Change of Expression
By the end of the week we had to cancel out facial expressions as an identifying feature; for we could detect no change of expression existing at the time, or any problem that momentarily faced them. But there were differences. No two were exactly the same. No two had exactly the same volume, or pitch, to their voices when they baaed.

Each had a bodily action peculiarly its own. Each, we found, had an individuality, and a personality with its own mannerisms. Some had hair-trigger tempers, flying angry at the slightest irritation, while others refused to become ruffled, even when faced with conditions that should upset them.

We later found we could liberate a sheep with which we had established a speaking acquaintance in the pasture with a half a hundred others, and later pick it out from all the rest. In spite of the similarity, each one had a little something different about it.

We enlarged the class from the chosen six to 12, and to 20, and we found each was a different individual, each with some distinguishing feature, action, or characteristic. Later we talked to a serious-minded gentleman who had studied a large flock of domestic hens instead of sheep, and he too had been surprised to find that each hen was a little different from every other hen. Like sheep, they too are as unlike as "peas in a pod."
