Waste Disposer Buying, Using Hints Outlined

Corvallis - Summer's the time to consider installation of a waste disposer if you'd like to quickly and easily dispose of melon rinds, fruit and vegetable parings.

Buying and care tips for satisfactory operation are offered by Bernice Strawn, Oregon State university extension specialist.

Two Types
Two types of disposers, the batch and continuous feed models, are available. The batch feed model requires intermittent filling and grinding. The switch for starting and stopping the disposer is in the sink closure. To operate, the disposer is to drain position and cold water carries off the pulverized waste.

The continuous feed type operates with an electric switch placed near the sink. When switched to "on" and wastes can be continually fed into the disposer. A splash guard of rubber-like material in the sink opening prevents whirling bits of food or bone from flying out.

When cleaning vegetables, watch that rubber and wire bands don't drop in. Don't put these in your disposer—tin, glass, plastic, hard seafood shells, large meat bones, string, cigarette butts. It's estimated that 20 per cent of Northwest homes have waste disposers.
