

Adenauer Balk on Test Treaty Based on Divided Germany

By WELLINGTON LONG
United Press International
Bonn — West Germany's reluctance to sign the limited nuclear test ban treaty stemmed from Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's fears that Soviet-American agreements may be made on the basis of a forever-divided Germany.

It was the common struggle against the United States and Russia together, and it was a dispute about the division of the German spoils that drove them apart.

Adenauer knows Moscow would be perfectly satisfied to settle now on the basis of two German states — one with a freely elected pro-Western government, the other with a Communist regime held in place with Soviet bayonets.

He has been nagged for years by the fear the United States would accept the two German states theory, too, if that appeared to be the only thing delaying agreement on issues of more direct interest to the American people.

The "old man" of Germany always knew the question would become acute when and if the United States and Russia approached a disarmament agreement.

It became urgent in fact with the signature in Moscow of the partial nuclear test ban treaty. The treaty is open to signatures of all states — and the East German regime was among the first to sign it.

Adenauer contends, and his Western allies are on record as supporting his contention, that only a freely elected government can speak for Germany. His is the only freely elected government in Germany. The Communist regime in the Soviet zone of Germany was imposed on it by the Red army, which also maintained it in power through the workers revolt of 1953.

The Western powers have insisted Germany must be reunited by free elections throughout the country. The Soviet Union contends the two parts of Germany have made their choice, and that the two regimes are of equal status and should negotiate their differences directly.

None of the NATO members recognizes the regime of East Germany as legitimate, and, by threatening diplomatic sanctions, West Germany has managed to prevent the shaky neutral states taking up full scale relations with it.

But as the years have passed, the East German regime has nevertheless managed to improve its international status.

It has established several trade missions in the Middle East, Africa and Asia, and managed to get their chiefs accredited as consuls general.

In 1959, both the East German and West German administrations were seated as advisors at a big four foreign ministers conference in Geneva.

However, neither West Germany nor East Germany is in the United Nations. The Russians won't approve West Germany's application unless East Germany is allowed to join at the same time, and the Western powers won't accept that.

Adenauer's concern over the nuclear treaty has been that finally the East German regime was going to be seated at an international conference on an equal basis with members of NATO — and West Germany as well if she signed the treaty, too.

Article three of the nuclear treaty says it is open to all states for signature. Article two says proposed amendments to the treaty must be considered by a conference of all parties to it. An amendment requires the approval of a majority of all the parties to the treaty.

It is in these sections of the treaty that the West Germans have smelled danger. They feared that by simply signing the treaty, the East German regime would be attaining recognized international status.

The United States has insisted this is not so, that a regime cannot win recognition for itself but that recognition must be granted by another.

On the other hand, the U.S. State department has felt that if Communist China — a regime it also does not recognize — signed the nuclear test ban treaty it would do much to wipe out its Korean war record and smooth the path towards eventual entry of China into the United Nations.

Bonn is aware of this thought, and is running scared.

For that reason, Adenauer insisted on official American assurances that the East German regime has not gained international recognition simply by signing the nuclear treaty. For that reason, he also wanted to make sure that any other disarmament step is linked to a step toward reuniting Germany by means of a free election.
