Truman Says Slim Chance Russians Won't Break Treaty

New York - (UPI) - Former President Harry S. Truman said today the chances of the Russians not violating the recently signed test ban treaty were "very slim."
"I don't trust them across the street," he commented in an impromptu interview during his morning stroll. "They broke 32 agreements with me at Potsdam, and 48 altogether, including the ones signed by President Roosevelt at Yalta."
"You can't blame me for being a little skeptical. They're no good," he added, again referring to the Russians.
Nevertheless, Truman said the treaty, still subject to Senate ratification, had his full backing. "I'm for it, and I wrote President Kennedy and told him so."
May Change
"The idea is to get a start on those things and you can always amend them. After all, they, the Russians, may change and keep the agreement. That's the chance you've got to take."
Truman, still jaunty for his 79 years, would not hazard a guess on how long it would be before the treaty is broken. "I'm no prophet, and I don't intend to be, but it's a step in the right direction," he commented.
When asked about the opposition of Dr. Edward Teller, "father of the H-bomb," to the treaty, Truman said, "he's a good scientist, but he doesn't know anything about politics."

Trapped Miners Joke, Laugh, Sing Songs, Enter 11th Day

By H. D. QUIGG
United Press International
"From this valley they say you are going..."
Eleven days under, and the entombed men are singing. Two of them.
"I miss your bright eyes and sweet smile..."
Joking, laughing at death.
"Ask Gene, did I get any traffic tickets?"
The third man down there in the caved-in coal mine... well, he's trapped in another compartment and nothing has been heard from him since Tuesday. The rescuers and the well-wishers on the morbidly curious on the surface, 330 feet above, seem to have quickly agreed to stop talking about him.
But David Fellin, 58, and Henry Throne, 28, are fighting the good fight - as are their kintfolk on the surface, the way veteran mine families always do in the tragedies of man's fight to tap the earth.
Throne sings "Red River Valley." Fellin is a "Pennsylvania Polka" man. His wife, Anna, 47, sad-eyed but composed, has watched at the surface every day.
"They'll get Davey out. I know they will," she says.
Face Long Odds
But Fellin's brother, Joseph, 61 and just retired, says he figures there is about a 100-to-1 chance and he adds: "We both should have given up mining years ago - only reason you don't is that it's the only place to go."

An expert on the surface, Lt. Richard Anderson of the Naval Research Institute, says he thinks they can hold out a long time.
"It's a tribute to their guts that they haven't given up by now. That's always the worry. But these are pretty tough characters."
You drive out along a dirt road to the outskirts of the village of Shepppton, Pa., through the anthracite country, wooded, hilly, with a scattering of dirty shacks. You stop about 300 yards from the mine shaft where the cave-in trapped the men 11 days ago.
As you walk to the roped off area where the high-speed drills have been probing to find the trapped men with rescue shafts, you notice fine gray dust aloft and spread around. This is the pulverized stone from below, dug up and shot out as the drill works. The rescue workers are masked to protect their lungs.
Dust Piled High
Some workers shovel it away from the machinery; it's three to four feet deep in some places.
The drills make a pounding clanking noise. Near dusk Thursday, in order to lower radioactive cobalt to see if the two could use a geiger counter to detect how close a missed-mark shaft was, the big drill suddenly stopped. Dead silence. The observers looked stunned for a moment. You could hear birds twittering far off. It might have been some kind of irony. Because a radio station man had sent a query down the long line to Fellin, 331 feet away.

"Hey, Davey, what kind of music do you like?" he spoke into the mike.
"I want to hear the birdies sing," came Fellin's voice grating out of the two loudspeakers at the shaft top.
Then he broke again into "Pennsylvania Polka."
"How's that announcer they had to take to the hospital?" Fellin asked announcer Elwood Tito, at the top.
Tito: "He's fine. He went to the hospital because he wanted to see the nurses."
Throne: "I tell you, we made a lot of trouble for a lot of people, didn't we?"
Tito: "That's okay, Dave."
Throne: "No, this is Hank."
Tito: "Did your voice change?"
Hank: "No, I'm just getting a little older."
Hank: "Any candy bars coming down?"
Tito: "Yes, we're sending some."
Hank: "Good for a little snack."
Tito: "Do you want the plain or with nuts?"
Hank: "That's the trouble. No nutty ones. I had to take my teeth out, that's why you didn't recognize my voice."
The crowd of 300 above laughed at this. There is a lot of joking up there. The Salvation Army was busy handing out snacks.

Graham Speaks at LA Youth Meeting

Los Angeles - (UPI) - Evangelist Billy Graham used the Biblical story of Samson at a youth meeting Thursday night to illustrate the need of parental guidance.
Speaking at the seventh session of his 21-day Los Angeles crusade, Graham also said that sometimes "over-privileged" children cause more trouble than those from slum areas.
The evangelist told 47,655 persons - the largest crowd to date - that Samson had "a parental problem," explaining:
"Samson's parents tried to advise him and guide him, but Samson was determined to have his own way, to go against his parents' advice.
"Even good parents present a problem to many teenagers who want to go their own way and live their own lives without any interference or advice. The Bible teaches plainly that we are to honor our father and mother. The Scripture says: 'Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right.'"

Biologists Issue Plea in Behalf of Vanishing Species

Washington - (UPI) - Biologists issued a plea today in behalf of "vanishing species."
They addressed it to earth's fiercest predator, man. They appealed to his economic self-interest, to his moral sense, and to the delight and scientific knowledge he derives from creatures of the wild.
Nature has been evolving different forms of life for something like three billion years. Nature itself has doomed the great majority of species of extinction.
But it has let about 3,500 species of mammals, including man, and 8,000 species of birds survive to the present. In recent times the great extingisher has been not nature but man.
Man is The Villain
In a symposium at the 16th international congress of zoology scientists said that in 99.9 per cent of the tragedies which wipe out whole species today, man is the villain.
He kills off irreplaceable animal types either by direct slaughter or by destruction of habitats through stream pollution, the felling of forests, or indiscriminate use of poisons.
Many of the 1,500 species of mammal in Africa are in danger. But the new African states are trying to save some of them. There are sound economic grounds for doing so.
In Africa, scientists have discovered, wild animals properly husbanded, can provide hungry man with more protein food on marginal lands than cattle grazing the same areas can produce.
We Don't Own World
In the opinion of Ian McTaggart Cowan of the University of British Columbia, Vancouver, there is a far more compelling reason for trying to save species now in jeopardy. Said Cowan:
"We don't own the world. We hold a life rental on it. It is our responsibility to turn it over to our descendants in at least as good condition as when we got it, preferably better."
So far man has destroyed 100 mammal and more than 100 bird species. In danger are 55 mammal, 100 fish, 48 bird, and six reptile species.

Helicopter Crew Recovers Body

Mount Shasta, Calif. - (UPI) - A helicopter crew Thursday recovered the body of a U.S. Forest Service employee who fell 300 feet to his death down a glacier near the top of 14,161-foot Mt. Shasta.
The body of Bill Mikm of Glenwalk, N.J., was brought to the Mt. Shasta Ski Bowl at 7,700 feet by a turbojet 'copter of the Hiertager Helicopter Service at nearby Etna.
Mikm fell Wednesday while climbing with Stephen Teilmann. Both were employed at the Lassen National Forest in northeast California.
