This year, Minn decided to bring the group to Oregon. Minn, who graduated from Willamette university, reported that "the brisk air and cold nights are a new experience for many of the boys."

The group whose ages ranged from 8 to 16 years camped out wherever they happened to be at night. The bus had a portable stove and a cooler. According to Minn, everybody got into the cooking act and they all enjoy trying to cook.

The tour included such spots as stops at fish hatcheries, Crater lake, Diamond lake and plywood and pulp paper plants. The group went to Jacksonville and spent the afternoon going through the museum.

The boys and Minn returned to Portland by way of the coast route. In the words of Minn, they "checked into the Portland YMCA for much needed baths and a night of rest before returning to Hawaii."

Plywood Group Plans Salem Event

Tacoma—A market that consumes more than 20 per cent of all softwood plywood will dominate sessions of the annual fall meeting of the Douglas Fir Plywood association, Sept. 29-Oct. 1 at Salem.

The use of plywood by industry has been overshadowed by the demands of the light construction market, which uses about 60 per cent of production, but is considered to have the greatest growth potential for this west coast industry, according to James R. Turnbull, DFPA executive vice president, Tacoma, Wash. This will be the first meeting of all its members ever held by the DFPA in a location south of Portland, and will be the first time the light construction market has not dominated the sessions of a meeting. It also will be the first time a member outside the five western states has been represented at a DFPA meeting.

The association announced two weeks ago that Southern Pine Plywood Company, of Diboll, Tex., has applied for membership.

About 300 executives of DFPA's 130 members are expected to attend the meeting.
