Duncan Terms Legislative Process as 'Fascinating'

As a freshman Representative, Duncan freely admits he still had much to learn about legislative process and traditions, but he says he is "learning as I go." He termed the legislative process to be "fascinating — as much so in Washington as in Salem."

Two other avenues for the "liberalization" and speeding up of Congress stem from two recent developments, the Congressman said. One is the recent decisions on apportionment of the states for legislative representation; the other is the coming increased enfranchisement of the Negroes in the South.

The first, Duncan believes, will do much to decrease the over representation of rural areas, long dominant in many state legislatures and congressional delegations. This will make Congress a more truly democratic and representative body, he believes.

The second, which will permit southern Negroes to vote for the first time, will make southern politicians far more responsive to their needs. He grinned and said, "The 'Nigra' will become the 'colored gentlemen' in the vocabulary of many southern politicians."

Duncan expressed satisfaction over the progress of the Rogue Basin project, which already has been authorized. "I know it's not moving fast enough for some people around here," he said. "But this is going to be a bad year for reclamation projects, and if we can merely hold the amount (for planning) in the administration's budget, we'll be doing marvelously well. If we can increase it, it will be almost miraculous."

He still hopes that the sums allocated for the project, particularly the Lost Creek dam, can be increased.

Angus will be staying with the Ed Brain family at the Duncan home at 1500 Terrace dr. during the coming school year.

Eldest daughter Nancy will attend university in Washington, either at American or Georgetown universities. She has tentative acceptances from both.

The other children — David, 12, Jamie, 10, Laurie, 9, and Bonnie, 2, moved with their mother over the week end to a new home the family purchased on Lake Bancroft, near Falls Church, Va. All but Bonnie will be attending school near there this fall.

Doesn't Plan to Move
Duncan disavowed a rumor that he plans to move his permanent residence to Eugene. "First I'd heard of it," he said. "He plans to keep his permanent address in Medford, and is thinking seriously about building a home on acreage he owns in 'Little Switzerland,' east of Roxy Ann butte."

In a two-hour interview, the Congressman touched on a number of subjects — Washington traffic, the difficulty of commuting, the unappealing expenses which face a Congressman, his optimism for enactment of an Oregon Dunes National Seashore bill, and, inevitably, political speculation.

He said he simply has not yet decided whether to run for reelection next year, and was considering returning to the practice of law. But he grinned knowingly when reminded that he had said he was undecided when asked if he would run for office in 1962, 1960, 1958 and 1956.

As for running for governor or senator, he said it is far too early even to consider such a possibility. But he concedes that he likes politics, and the work and meeting people which it involves.

Duncan took advantage of the Labor Day recess of Congress to make his trip home. Congress will reconvene next Monday, but he plans to return by Thursday.

During his stay here he plans to talk with numerous friends or senators, he said it is far too

Another Crisis in Railroad Dispute Seen Next March

Washington—(UPI)—The possibility of another crisis in the railroad dispute next March, generating new threats of a nationwide strike, has not been ruled out by administration officials.

Publicly, government peace-makers express confidence the unprecedented arbitration law passed by Congress will settle the four-year-old controversy.

Privately, they acknowledge that a deadlock could develop over so-called secondary issues in the dispute over job-reducing work rule changes demanded by the railroads.

Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz says he believes the secondary issues could be settled without a new strike threat.

Wirtz blamed the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and two other unions representing conductors and switchmen for the breakdown of a voluntary arbitration agreement.

Giants Hold to Claim Of 'Oldest Backfield'

Editor's note: This is another in the series of dispatches sizing up the prospects of professional football teams for the 1963 season.

By NORMAN MILLER
UPI Sports Writer

New York (UPI) Coach Al Sherman jokes about the age of his New York Giants.

Upon acquiring 34-year-old halfback Hugh McElhenny in a trade at the start of pre-season training, Sherman gaged: "He just became old enough to be eligible for our ball club."

It is difficult to tell whether Sherman's confidence is genuine or whether he is joking to camouflage a fear that old age might finally catch up with his team.

For the past five years this club has laughed at time. Before each season, it was said the Giants were "getting old." Yet in four of those seasons they won the Eastern Division championship.

When Sherman inserts McElhenny into a backfield that includes 36-year-old quarterback Y. A. Tittle, fullback Alex Webster, 32, and flanker Frank Gifford, 33, their total age is 135 years. It is improbable that any older backfield ever was assembled in the National Football league.

The Giants have made a few concessions to youth — at linebacker, where Bill Winter had an outstanding rookie season in 1962, at center, where third-year Greg Larson has shifted to replace the retired Ray Wietecha; and at guard, where sophomore Pro Brookie Bolin takes over for Larson.

Relies on Oldsters
Generally, however, Sherman will rely on his "grand old men." In addition to his backs, that means player-coach Andy Robustelli, starting his 13th pro season at defensive end; defensive tackle Dick Modzelewski, offensive tackle Jack Stroud, and linebacker Tom Scott, each in his 11th campaign; offensive tackle Roosevelt Brown, starting his 10th and player-coach Jimmy Patton starting his ninth.

Despite the fact that the Giants are favored to win a third straight division title, a few close to the club feel that Sherman has a few reasons for concern.

Tittle, who has looked as brilliant as ever in starting his 16th pro campaign, must stay physically sound for the whole season. His understudy, Ralph Guglielmi, has not shown well in pre-season games.

The running attack is only so-so. This phase of the offense has not been helped by preseason injuries to Webster and Phil King. McElhenny, who under went an off-season knee operation, is expected to be used only in spots.

Larson and Bolin, relatively inexperienced, must hold up as their key interior line positions. And the old defenders must continue to shake off the poundings of their many tough pro campaigns and produce the superb play that on occasion has bailed out a bogged-down offense.

Lovetere Strengthens Line
The defensive front-line appears strengthened by the addition of John Lovetere, 250-pound tackle acquired from Los Angeles for Roosevelt Crier.

Younger players are pressing two regulars for starting jobs. At tight end, Aaron Thomas poses a threat to Joe Walton. Del Shofner, at split end, is still the Giants' prime receiver.

At linebacker, Jerry Hillbrand, who spent his rookie season in the "taxi" squad, is putting heat on 33-year-old Scott Winter and Sam Huff are fixtures at the other back-up spots.

And in the backfield, there are Patton and Al Webb at safety; Erich Barnes, Dick Lynch at the corners, with Dick Pesonen a capable fill-in at both positions.
