HOW MUCH DOES A BABY COST?

How much does a baby cost? A new baby in your family is one of the biggest financial bargains you can find today — among the few things relatively less expensive than in the depression '30s.

This column continues my financial guide to the great moments of life, and "the baby" is a logical sequence to previous reports on how much it costs a bride to tie up her husband legally on the wedding day, how little it costs a groom to take a wife and how much the average husband spends on a honeymoon. My sources are the American Medical Association, the University of Chicago's Health Information Foundation, the Health Insurance Institute, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., and Stern's, a medium-priced New York department store.

Total medical costs now — hospital room, delivery, pre-and post-natal obstetrical care, special medicines — average only $300. Addition of all other usual expenses brings the grand total to around $650.

In comparison, the grand total cost in the mid-1930s was $225 to $450, but to see that estimate in perspective you must recognize that the cost of living in the United States has more than doubled since the 1930s and today's dollar buys less than half what it bought then. In view of the plunge in the dollar's buying power, today's $650 is actually much lower than 1935's $450. To be specific:

Doctor's fees average $170-$175. The $300 medical cost breaks down roughly 50-50 between hospital room and fees and doctor bills.

Layette, crib and mattress, around $60 each.
Carrriage, $45 to $80.

Maternity clothes, about $95 for two day dresses, one cocktail dress, a couple of skirt-blow combinations, underwear. The average rises to $120 if you have your baby in winter and must buy heavier clothes. Many of these items will be gifts or hand-me-downs, and some department stores offer a second set of everything free if you have twins.

Incidentally, a second baby ordinarily costs a fraction of what the first costs, because you need not buy everything new.

If you have a practical nurse, figure on at least $50 for two-three days, more if she stays longer. Add another $25 for extras you can't calculate in advance.

Of course, these are just average estimates, and having a baby can cost spectacularly more. Fashionable obstetricians may charge well over $300, a private hospital room may run more than $50 a day, a "complicated" delivery may hike the bill by 30 per cent or more. But the most authoritative estimate for the average expense is $650 — which suggests Americans are spending well over $2 billion annually to have babies (last year, 4,167,000 were born).

There's no disputing that baby costs are rising year after year, because hospital and doctors' bills are mounting and a dramatically increasing number of women are going to the hospital to have their babies.

But offsetting this trend is the fact that hospitalization periods are shortening — a vital point in view of the fact that the average price of a hospital room and routine services is $36.83 a day. A new mother spends an average of 4 1/2 days in a hospital now, against the two weeks she might have spent during the 1930s.

Even more important, about 65 per cent of today's babies are covered by medical insurance, with average benefits running at $230 — a full 75 per cent of the medical costs.

No young parent should feel himself about skyrocketing costs of his baby as his infant moves into the young child and then the explosively expensive teenage school years. The squeeze on his pocketbook will become progressively brutal.

Still, it's a pleasure to report that, at the start, the baby is a bargain — and who can foresee the return on this investment.
