WORK SMARTER — NOT HARDER

Have you ever been horrified to see a lot of wrinkles when you look in a mirror lighted by fluorescent tubes? Don't despair, you don't really look that old! Someone just put in the wrong kind of fluorescent light, and it's easily changed.

There are actually seven colors of white fluorescent tubers. In a bathroom, bedroom or kitchen use the deluxe warm white. This creates a warm atmosphere, is kind to skin tones, foods and all warm colors.

If your living room is blue or green then the cool white tube should be used to enhance the color of the furnishings. If it is furnished with warm colors, then use the deluxe warm white.

Brown stains on the inside of a dishwasher are usually due to iron in the water supply. The glasses may have a brown or yellow film also.

To remove this stain, put ½ teaspoon of oxalic acid in the dishwasher and NO detergent. (First, remove any silverware, plastic or metal utensils.) Run the dishwasher through the regular washing cycle. When finished, add dishwasher detergent and let it wash through the complete cycle again.

Precaution — Oxalic acid (available at the drugstore) is poisonous. Handle with care and keep out of the reach of children.

Mrs. Dorothy F. Brown, Benton County Extension Agent, says some women have reported successful use of citric acid also for the removal of these stains.

For more information on iron problems, write me for our Extension Fact Sheet "Iron in Your Water Supply."

Venison Handling Tips Given by OSU Specialist

(EDITORS NOTE: The Oregon hunting season for deer will open Saturday, September 28. The following release is a timely one received from the Oregon State University news bureau and tells of how deer meat should be handled following the kill.)

CORVALLIS—Fresh, flavorful venison for the table starts with careful treatment of the meat in the field, advises Andrew Landforce, Oregon State University specialist in wildlife management.

Keep deer meat at its best by cooling quickly—the quicker the better, Landforce says. He urges that the deer be skinned as soon as possible.

It's ideal when deer can be field dressed and immediately taken to camp, home or the cold storage locker to be skinned, he noted. Probably the cleanest meat from the woods is handled this way.

However, this isn't always possible and Landforce offers the following suggestions for care of deer that can't be taken back right away:

Dress, Hang, Skin

In Western Oregon, unless the deer is moved easily from the field, dress it, hang it in a tree and skin it once. Split the carcass in half and leave the last neck vertebrae connected to help balance the halves while hanging.

Preferably let hang until the meat is no longer sticky. Dry meat is easier to keep clean. Hanging over night in the cold woods is good. The meat gets cold and a glaze forms over it.

If pack animals are impractical, cut the deer in quarters and drop each quarter into an individual clean cloth bag. Strap your load on the pack board for carrying out of the woods.

Immediately upon reaching your destination, hang meat in a cool, dry place. The cold storage locker is ideal, but lots of good venison has also been cared for in garages and woodsheds.

For Eastern Oregon conditions, if you can't get the deer back to camp and skinned immediately, field dress and skin the deer in the field. Hanging the deer in a tree is preferred, but, if this is not possible, remove the hide while the deer is lying on the ground.

Use the skin and meat sacks to keep meat clean while skinning. After the hide is off, quarter the carcass and put the pieces in individual meat sacks. Pack back to camp and hang it up at once.

If it is not practical to carry the meat back to camp right away, hang it in a tree or lay it upon poles or rocks to allow air to circulate around the meat, speeding up the cooling process.

It is always best to let meat hang and thoroughly cool before moving it. When the meat gets a glaze over it, handling is easier and meat can be kept much cleaner.

Deer eventually will cool when hung with the hide on. In some cases, deer are downed in circumstances which makes circling impractical, but even then cool the animal as quickly as possible in order to keep the meat at its best, says the specialist.

Care should also be taken to keep the meat cool on the way home, Landforce stresses. A carrier or rack on the car top will allow cooling air to circulate around the meat. Never carry venison in a tightly closed trunk or on the hood of a car where engine heat is transferred to the meat.
