JFK More Cautious Prophet On Reducing Nation's Jobless

By WILLIAM J. EATON United Press International Washington (UPI)—President Kennedy took office in January, 1963, with high hopes of slashing the nation's jobless rolls to 4 per cent of the work force by mid-1963.

Now that his self-imposed deadline is past, Kennedy is a much more cautious prophet. He foresees a reduction in the present 5.5 per cent jobless rate to 5 per cent by early 1966 if Congress approves his economy-stimulating tax cut.

The most recent job figures, for August, indicate that unemployment fell below 4 million for the first time in eight months. But the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment, the key indicator, was virtually unchanged at 5.5 per cent of the labor force.

How could the President, aided by an array of top economists and the government's vast data-collecting machinery, have been so far off in his earlier estimate?

No Simple Answer The answer is not simple. But a fast-changing technology, a flood of teen-age job seekers and the lack of spectacular economic growth have been major factors.

Most economists involved believe the administration has taken all the steps advisable to hold down the unemployment rate despite the inability to roll it back to the pre-recession level of 1959.

Kennedy is reluctant to use certain stimulants—such as a general lowering of interest rates—for fear it might further weaken the U.S. balance of payments position or lead to further losses of gold.

No Unanimity Noted There is no unanimity on the long-range answer to the problem.

Chairman Walter Heller of the President's Council of Economic Advisers has argued that stepped-up demand is the basic answer. They would spur consumer buying power by encouraging business investment and public spending.

Others—primarily Federal Reserve Board Chairman William McCh. Martin—Believe that so-called "structural unemployment" is the major cause of nagging joblessness.
