

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Despite its remarkable advancements in recent years, medical science has as yet been unable to find a sure-fire cure for hangovers.

Persons suffering from this widespread malady are still largely dependent on home remedies, based mainly on superstition and old wives' tales. None is guaranteed effective.

The other day, however, I heard about a new type of treatment that may be the answer. It was described to me by a New York advertising man I met at a luncheon here.

This chap has been working on an ad campaign for the Bulova Watch Co. and last summer his duties took him to Las Vegas, Nev., to obtain group photographs of 107 cowboys.

Perhaps you're wondering, as I did, what they wanted with a picture like that. Well, it was to illustrate, ad-wise, that the company sells 107 different types of waterproof watches.

A Difficult Job It was no simple job to round up 107 cowboys in Las Vegas, but the adman did it. They were instructed to rendezvous out on the prairie early one morning in picturesque costumes.

The adman, however, made the mistake of celebrating the accomplishment prematurely. When he awoke that morning he had the worse case of effects he had ever experienced. His head felt like it might have belonged to Walt Whitman.

About the last thing he wanted to do was rendezvous on the prairie with 107 cowboys. But by then it was too late to make other arrangements.

For about an hour the anguished adman suffered under the sun while the cameraman set up the shot. Then, as fate would have it, he stepped in a gopher hole and fell flat on his face.

Welby is a junior in the School of Humanities and Social Science. He will appear in the melodrama, "The Aspern Papers," scheduled Dec. 5, 6 and 7 on campus. The OSU speech department presents six plays each year to give speech students training in drama and to let other students on campus see some of the nation's leading plays.
