

Small Worlds Around Us

Feathered Travelers Are Dispatched By Fall's Arrival Unnoticed, because the days are still warm and summer-like, the fall of the year comes on apace. Evidence of the change is visible everywhere if we care to notice. The golden-rod is in bloom. Across any vacant lot, or between bushes and buildings there appear the silken webs of the late summer spiders, shimmering in the sun. Unnoticed by most of us, the entire world of insects has speeded up. These creatures have just about completed their life cycles; they are preparing for the season's end, which also means the end of their lives.

All the creatures of the wild either know it is time for the change, or at least instinctively react to it. Their activity has become almost frantic in the hurry to readjust themselves. Many of the shore and wading birds have migrated south. Many of them will have traveled thousands of miles, from northern nesting grounds, to warmer southern shores. By some mysterious and little understood method of navigation these winged tourists have negotiated great distances without the aid of a compass, or a road map. They have risked a great deal, faced tremendous hazards, fought the elements and the darkness of night; in many instances have fought man himself, to return to the identical spot their ancestors visited last year, or a hundred years ago.

First Trip
Many of these birds have made the trip south for the very first time. Many were born during the past summer and are making the long migration for the first time. Some of the younger ones followed their elders who already knew the route. Others came alone and unaided, urged on by some inherent pattern of behavior established by their species, many thousands of generations ago. How they know, or how they find their way over those long, unmarked, but apparently recognized sky-roads is a question the greatest scientific minds in the world cannot answer.

The one thing we can be sure of is they actually do accomplish the seemingly impossible, and arrive and depart according to some vague, and pre-arranged plan. The migrants are already on the wing, or have arrived; more will follow as the fall of the year proceeds, because it's fall, and somehow they know.

Observant Ones
Although very few mark the departure or the arrival of the feathered ones to the southern shores, those that are the least observant can also tell the time of year by looking out across a body of water, across a field, or a vacant lot, at a distant hillside, or for any distance, and see the peculiar haze between them and the horizon. It is a flimsy veil of something, thinner than smoke, more elusive than fog, that hovers in the cooling air like a shimmering mist; it is the breath of the drying summer.

Nights will continue to grow cooler. The daytime sun will lose much of its warmth. Clouds that have been so constantly present during the summer, will grow scarce. As the earth and the water cools there is less vapor to feed them; soon the clouds will die from malnutrition.

By the roadsides, in edges of lakes and ponds, the cattails turn brown. Leaves wither and fall. The frogs that made the summer nights vibrant with their croaking slow to a stop. Turtles too, seek the warmth of the bottom mud. Somewhere the sun has already crossed an invisible line, and suddenly—it's fall.

Newbry To Speak At Tuesday Event

State Sen. Lynn Newbry will discuss tax problems and the cost of government in the state of Oregon with members of the Jackson County Property Owners Rental Association Tuesday, Oct. 29.

The meeting has been called for 7:30 p.m. in Room 35 of the Medford High School. All rental property owners and interested persons are invited to the meeting, sponsors said.

Sen. Newbry is chairman of the Health and Welfare Committee, vice chairman of Labor and Industries and a member of the Agriculture, State and Federal Affairs, and the Ways and Means Committee.

The Ways and Means Committee will be considering the budget reductions resulting from defeat of the tax referendum. Sen. Newbry's meeting with the local association will give members an opportunity to ask questions regarding the type of tax program they think is best suited for the state at this time.
