A new baby had arrived in the family, and three-year-old Billy was pushed aside when all the neighbors and friends came to visit. After the crowd eventually thinned out, Billy got a chance to peek in the crib himself.

"Enjoy it now," he was heard whispering to the infant, "because it won't be long before you're old and neglected like me."

Decidedly Different, of Course!

How frequently I flatter friends With comments on their youth, Which they reciprocate (though not With flattery—just the truth).

It'll Be a Beauty

My wife has a dressing-room table that's filled With all sorts of items with which she is skilled:
With creams that are cleansing and creams that are vanishing, With potions for adding and lotions for banishing,
With curlers and tweezers and clippers and files,
With bottles and boxes and hairpins in piles.
It looks, I confess, like a chemistry lab,
This place where for hours she can dibble and dab,
And I hope she knows well what it says on each label
That graces the bottles and jars on this table,
Or some day, at work here combating erosion, She'll leave us, I fear, in a mighty explosion.
—Richard Armour

Two businessmen met on the street for the first time in months. "You must have been real proud of your son when he graduated from medical school," one said. "All those years you scrimped and sacrificed just so he could be a doctor. What did he say to you when he got his degree?" "Dad," the other answered sadly, "I want you to cut down drinking and go on a rigid diet."
