Public Demand for Service Industries Aiding Construction

NEW YORK (UPI) - The growth of the service industries and the public demand for the services they sell, is putting some bigger figures into one section of building statistics. This is the view of a New York architect, Max O. Urbahn, who believes that there is a chance that the price figure for commercial building may top that for construction by the end of 1963, and for the first time. Another figure involved in this segment of the building industry, Maurice Moguescu, also cautions that a business-commercial office space may find that a thorough engineering and cost study of his room requirements may save him money in the long run. Types of Construction Urbahn said that industrial construction was more than $3.25 billion in 1956, and commercial building only slightly more than $2 billion. But in 1962 the disparity had almost vanished; both industrial and commercial were close to the $2.5 billion level, and he believes that this year will see commercial reaching the top spot. He feels that the reduction in the volume of building by industry results from improved technology and automated procedures which have enabled manufacturers to get along with less square footage for the same amount of production. But commercial building linked to the rise in business services, should continue to gain, he believes. Urban building of office structures; the spread to the suburbs of shopping centers, hotels, motels and banks, following the families who demand these services, all has helped to change the trend toward a bigger share of commercial building. Both Urbahn and Moguescu, who is president of Designs for Business, Inc., emphasize the need for careful evaluation of space and structure by either the industrial or the commercial building tenant. Lease Costs Vary Moguescu has said that the true cost of leasing commercial office space cannot be determined by figuring on square foot rentals only. In some cases the company may be paying extra for facilities or services that are included as part of the rental in another building, he said. Costs of maintenance, painting, cleaning and air conditioning may double the "cost of living" of a company in an older building, he said, although the monthly rent might be, on the surface, only half what the rental charges would be in a new building where such services are included in one charge. Careful and continuing study by the businessman of his space needs may save him money, Moguescu believes; changes in office procedures, expansion of operations, may alter his requirements for room. Urbahn, head of the office of Max O. Urbahn, is managing director of an architectural-engineering team designing the moon-shot Apollo project structures at Cape Canaveral.
