Stealing Crows Even Victimize Own Kind

Probably because of the popularity of crows as pets, people who have owned one come up with interesting facts concerning these birds. Most agree that the crow is a pretty smart operator. Owning a pet crow gives the owner an insight into crow behavior that is often rather surprising. Talking with hunters, farmers, and others that have had occasion to observe these birds reveals some behavior traits that would seem to indicate the crow is gifted with a knowledge pretty closely associated with intelligence.

Farmers usually hate crows so violently that they misjudge the bird's actions. The crow hunter treats the crow with some respect, but usually refuses to admit the bird often out-smarts him. The student of bird behavior, usually viewing the subject impartially, is frequently amazed at what these songless birds seem to know.

The combined opinion of all, however, is that the common crow is reasonably high in IQ. He early adopts the "I-won't-believe-it-until-I-see-it" attitude. Even after the accumulated mass of data is before him and is mulled over, he admits there are many pertinent questions still without a satisfactory answer, but agrees that he is dealing with some remarkable and astonishing intelligent birds.

Clannish Creatures
The survival pattern of the crow clan, is phenomenal. They have survived and increased in numbers mainly because their uncanny ability to take care of themselves. Being exceedingly clannish creatures, they almost knock themselves out helping one another. The "all for one and one for all" formula finds fulfillment in crow society.

Among themselves crows are mischievous to the point of being actually pests, often driving some of their fellow flock-mates almost to distraction. Yet they readily forgive their friends if they trick backfires and will try desperately to repeat the trick on some other crow. Toward one another they hold no grudge. To forgive and forget, to the crow, is a virtue.

Knowing that pet crows possess what amounts to an obsession in thievery, we decided to concentrate on this facet of crow behavior in observing a large rookery that we had under observation with binoculars. We had constructed a blind but it is doubtful if we fooled the birds by it.

They early found that we meant them no harm so proceeded on their daily activities as if we were not present.

Odd Possessions
Daily we watched individual birds come to their nest with some object, aside from food, in their bills. Usually the objects were shiny. We saw spoons, flashlight bulbs, sea shells, small, odd shaped stones, and a wide assortment of odds and ends that appealed to the bird's sense of possession.

We noticed too, what happened when some other bird, aside from the real owner of one of these treasures, decided to steal from his neighbor. He would wait until the owner was away, then swoop down onto the nest, grab the prize and carry it away. Some of the birds would patrol carefully, flying high over the rookery where they could look down into the nests and see whether or not the owner was away. If the coast was clear, down they would fly to grab what appealed to them.

When the owner of the nest returned, he often noticed the article was missing. He would know what to do; up into the air he would go and look over the other nests and storage spots. If he found what he was looking for, he would steal it back. At the same time he would usually take something else. Even if caught in the act, there seemed to be no hard feelings. He might set up a holler for a while, but in the end he forgave the transgression.

By a broad interpretation the moral of crow society would seem to be "send a thief to catch a thief" or, "to err is crow-like, but to forgive is divine."
