Epic-Type Production Planned by SOC Players

ASHLAND—Southern Oregon College Players will make their first venture into epic theater production with the presentation of An'ne Obey's "Noah" the first week end in December, it was announced by Dr. Dorothy Stolp, director.

English versions of the play by Arthur Wilmuth have been presented with success in both this country and in England. Such well known actors as John Geilgud, Jessica Tandy, and Alec Guinness appeared in the first London production in 1935 and Pierre Fesnay, a noted French actor, appeared in the New York production the same year, which received much critical acclaim.

Ludwig Bemelmans designed the scenery and Remo Bufane the animal masks for this production. The Belgrade Company at Coventry, England revived the play as part of the Coventry Drama Festival which was given in connection with the opening of the new Coventry Cathedral in 1961, and a London revival of the play is planned for this season. The play has also had a history of successful productions in educational theaters in this country.

Obey did not claim to have written "Noah" as a biblical play. It is more than a story of the flood. He took his plot from a great theme and gave it modern treatment using methods similar to those of the authors of the medieval mystery and miracle plays. The playwright also makes use of a chorus of children and a chorus of animals to comment upon and develop the action.

Players working upon the production find the different style of production challenging and they feel that the audience will find the play stimulating, Dr. Stolp said.
