

Year's Teaching Available at UO Under Intern Plan

EUGENE—A year's teaching experience will be made available to qualified students under the University of Oregon's teacher internship program.

In its second year, the program provides selected and mature students the opportunity of gaining "on-the-job-with-pay" experience leading to certification at either the elementary or secondary level and to a master's degree.

The program, jointly developed by the University and the Oregon State Department of Education, is aimed at improving elementary and secondary school instruction and teacher training throughout the state. Dr. John Suttle, assistant professor of education at the UO, is director of the Oregon Program for the University.

Selected From Students
Teacher interns will be selected from two types of persons — the student who has graduated with a liberal arts degree and wishes to teach, but has little or no course work in education; and the undergraduate who is willing to undertake a five-year program of preparation which includes a full year of on-the-job training.

The program will include pre-intern observation and participation in a classroom setting, summer workshop activities, a full year of teaching with guidance from both the school system and the University, and a post-intern summer session.

There are 26 student interns now taking advantage of the program. A substantial increase in this number is expected next year. Any person interested in a teaching career who has, or will have, a baccalaureate degree within the year, is eligible.

Additional information may be obtained by writing to Coordinator of Interns, School of Education, University of Oregon, Eugene, Ore.
