Believing that there is a demand for a paper in opposition to the old ones, we have determined to start the "Columbia Register." Its present plan is to publish two issues next week, the first of which, we believe, will receive the support of all the friends of a free press in the city.

COLUMBIA, March 23, 1865.

J. B. W. HARRISON.

The Register of 1865.

It was the Register's editorial policy to be independent and free from political influence. Its articles often criticized the government and its policies, and highlighted the need for a free press.

The Register was published weekly, and its articles covered a range of topics, from local news to national events. It was one of the few newspapers in the city to publish articles critical of the government, and its editorial stance was often controversial.

Despite its independent stance, the Register faced financial challenges, and in 1866 it was forced to cease publication. However, its legacy lived on, as its articles and editorials continued to be influential in shaping public opinion in Columbia.
