Mr. Howells will return shortly to finish up his year in that neighborhood, which will be about the first of November, then come home to stay.
 The sad intelligence reached us Saturday morning that Miss Etta McKay had succumbed to that dread disease, diphtheria. What makes it more sad is the fact that she is the second one from the same family taken within ten days. The parents are almost heart-broken, and serious doubts were entertained as to whether Mr. McKay would survive the shock, being afflicted with heart trouble; but we are glad to state that he is out of danger. Miss McKay was a very intelligent and agreeable young lady and had many friends in this community. The funeral took place Sunday.

Watson went up Hood river Sunday and left the same evening for Portland carrying with them 139 speckled beauties the result of his personal efforts in throwing a fly in Hood river, he having caught them all in less than two hours time—and Brown wasn't in it.
 The Raymond excursion party passed through here by train to The Dalles last Friday and took the boat in return to Portland next day. The party was composed of representative business men from New York, Philadelphia, Providence, New Haven, Baltimore, Buffalo, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, St. Paul and Minneapolis, and consisted of fifty-two persons. They were met at the train here by George C. Jones, who presented them with a basket of delicious fruit from the orchards of B. Warren, of this place, and A. H. Jewett, of White Salmon. There were apples, pears, peaches, plums, delicious ones and well worth all the praise they received. They had a kodak along and photographed them. Next time they make a trip through this country a stop over at Hood River will be on the programme.

Drowning of Daisy Curtis.
 On last Saturday little Daisy Curtis, only daughter of Anson and Mrs. Curtis, of Portland, was drowned in Spring Lake, below Idlewild.
 At 11 o'clock Saturday morning a party consisting of Mrs. T. J. Watson, Miss Dollie Martin, Len Curtis and Leonard C. Jones, of Portland, together with Miss Ethel Cook and Stanley Stowell, of Hood River, went to the lake for the purpose of bathing.
 Arriving at the lake, the children, Len and Daisy Curtis, together with Miss Cook and Mr. Jones, boarded a raft, which had been made for them a few days before, while the other ladies and Mr. Stowell floated in the water, only placing their hands on the timbers. Mr. Jones propelled the raft, by means of an oar, to the sand bar on the other side of the lake, where they all enjoyed swimming and bathing for an hour. Starting back, Mr. Stowell, together with Miss Cook and the children, remained on the raft, the others floating in the water with their hands on the raft and Mr. Jones swimming ahead. When about fifty feet from the shore, and where the water was twelve feet deep, the raft was by some unknown cause capsized, and in a moment all were struggling for their lives. Mr. Stowell and Mr. Jones were the only ones who could swim, and they at once swam to the aid of the drowning ones. Mr. Stowell grasped Miss Annie Martin and Miss Cook and took them safely to shore. Mrs. Watson climbed upon the raft, and throwing out the oar, begged the men to save the children. Mr. Jones, who was a long way off, came up to Miss Dollie Martin, after she had sunk twice, and she grasping him in a death grip, pulled him to the bottom with her. They rose to the surface, and through superhuman effort on the part of Mr. Jones, reached the shore, with the young lady in an exhausted condition. Throwing her from him high up on the bank, Mr. Jones started back for the children and reached the little boy just as he was sinking for the last time. Nothing was to be seen of the little girl, so the boy was drawn to shore safely, when the men at once started back to look for Daisy. She had not come to the surface after sinking the first time, and the supposition is that she swallowed a great deal of water, and that with her heavy bathing dress kept her down. Mr. Stowell and Mr. Jones, both of whom are expert swimmers, dove repeatedly from the raft to recover the little girl, but to no avail, and then came the awful fact that Daisy was drowned.
 Mrs. Watson had started immediately upon reaching shore for town, and on reaching the hotel shouted that some one had been drowned in the lake, and they must bring ropes and grapnel irons at once. Never did people respond more nobly to a call for aid, and in a few moments they had arrived at the scene of the accident, and regardless of clothing, many rushed into the lake and searched for the child's body, hoping that she might be brought to life if found; but all to no purpose until Jack Lucky arrived with a grapnel iron made of a piece of gas pipe, eighteen feet long, with wire hooks attached, which he made and brought to the lake within thirty minutes from his first arrival there. At the first drawing of the grapnel the body was brought to the surface and was borne to the shore by the willing and tender hands of the searchers.
 The child had been in the water then two hours, but hoping still to revive her, Dr. Thomas worked over her for an hour, but to no avail—little Daisy was drowned! Dr. Thomas notified her mother at once, breaking the news to her very gently and kindly.
 Mr. Curtis arrived here on a special train at 6:30 p. m., and they bore all that was mortal of their little girl back to Portland.
 No blame is attached to any one of the bathers, as the accident was unforeseen and everything possible was done to save the child's life.
 It is remarkable that all the others were saved, as the water was deep and all were struggling for their lives at once.
 Daisy was 11 years of age and Len 9, the children of Mr. Anson Curtis, who is well known here. He was engineer for the O. R. & N. Co. for thirteen years, running between Portland and The Dalles, and is now foreman of the shops of the Union Pacific at Albina.
 The residents of Hood River can well be called the kindest hearted and most sympathetic of people, for, forgetting their business and homes, they rushed to the rescue and worked nobly for two hours to save a human life.

 Drowned in Spring Lake below Hood River Saturday August 22, Daisy Curtis aged 11 years.

Death of Mr. Geddes.
 William Stewart Geddes, a member of the Oregon Lumber Co., and book-keeper ever since the firm was established here, five years ago, died suddenly last Sunday of brain fever or heart disease. He had been sick but a few days, complaining of a pain in his head Tuesday last, but was not confined to his bed until the day he died. Dr. Adams was called Thursday and stated that he had brain fever, but as he was getting along so well, was not considered dangerously sick. Mr. Ed Miller and Frank Davenport, with his wife, were caring for him, and they remained up Sunday night till about half-past 12, when, as he was resting well, all retired but Mr. Davenport. About 3 o'clock he called his wife, and placing his hand over his heart, said, "This is awful!" Mr. Miller was called, and by the time he reached his side he was breathing his last.
 The remains were embalmed by Undertakers Crandall & Burget, of The Dalles, and shipped to his old home at Planer, Utah, Monday night, accompanied by his family and brother, Grant Geddes, and Mr. West, who arrived here from North Powder Monday morning. He leaves a wife and five children, the eldest about 19 and the youngest aged 3 years. His family are well provided for and will remain in Utah. Mr. Geddes was an honest, upright man and the company will feel his loss severely.

Rescued by the Steamer Baker.
 Last Monday morning, about 8 o'clock, Mrs. Aleck and three children left their camp on the White Salmon, where they have been laying in their winter supply of fish, in their sail boat for this side of the Columbia, coming home for the day. When nearly over to this side, the boat, which is a leaky affair, filled with water and sunk, throwing them all out. The mother succeeded in catching hold of the two youngest children, a girl aged 8 and a boy 5. In the meantime the boat had drifted so far from her that she was unable to reach it. The oldest boy, George, aged 11 years, swam to the boat and got in and drifted ashore. The mother with her right hand clutched the boy's coat and the girl's dress and paddled with her left, succeeding in keeping up until she was rescued by the steamer Baker, which came along soon after she was in the water. The captain tried to reach her with the steamer, but finding that impossible, sent out a small boat, by which she was picked up. Being unable, of course, to hold the heads of her children above water, they were both drowned. Every means was used to restore them, but all were unavailing. Jo. Aleck, the father of the children, is an Indian, civilized, as is also the mother. Mr. Aleck was at the time across the river with the mail, being the mail carrier between this point and White Salmon, and knew nothing of the accident until his return several hours later. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. Father Bronsgeest, of The Dalles, Wednesday morning, and the children were buried at the home place. The community sympathizes with the parents in their sad bereavement.
