The Remarkable Outcome of Using Flour

Instead of Putty in Making Up. It is doubtful whether the annals of the American stage have anything more ludicrous than an accident which befell Actor was playing "The Seven Ages" at Los Angeles to standing room only. In his makeup as the judge in the fourth act Dixey wears an artificial nose—a huge Roman nasal appendage of putty colored with vermilion and ocher. Upon the occasion referred to the play made a big hit, and the first three acts were presented with all the regularity and smoothness of clockwork. At this point, however, Dixey made the discovery that the property man had neglected to provide putty for that rubicund judicial nose, Hastily summoning a call boy Dixey sent him out to procure the missing article. It was nearly time for the curtain when the youngster reappeared and reported, "I can't get no putty nowhere." Then Dixey gave an impromptu war dance which would have made him instantly famous had he been before an audience, and seizing the boy shouted: "Quick now! Get me some flour! Quick! Run to a grocery! Run every inch of the way going and coming!" Scared by the rather warlike demonstrations of Adonis the youngster lost no time in getting the much desired flour. Dixey hastily mixed the flour with a little water, kneaded it into dough, fashioned it into the semblance of his putty nose and painted it as usual. The result was eminently satisfactory; the dough was lighter than putty and more adhesive, while there was no difference in appearance. After a short wait the curtain was rung up and the fourth act proceeded. It was a warm night, and the heat from the gas footlights was quite oppressive. By the time Dixey had finished the celebrated dance in that act and had responded to an encore he was perspiring freely, owing to the unwonted heat. This combination of circumstances had a most wonderful effect upon the comedian's artificial nose. The members of the company were thunderstruck to observe that the most prominent feature of the judge's physiognomy was growing, and growing very rapidly too. Within three minutes from the begin ning of the act that wonderful nose had doubled in size and was still growing with a persistence which threatened soon to eclipse the other facial features. The orchestra noticed the phenomenon and every player stared at it in astonishment. Then the audience observed the change in the judge's appearance and wondered how it was produced and what it had to do with the play.

But matters steadily grew worse, and finally the actor was obliged to skip lightly from the stage to take heroic measures for reducing the mysterious and inexplicable swelling of his nose. About twothirds of it was left in the dressing room this time, but the fractional proboscis continued its dilating tactics, and when the act closed the judge's nose was still much

When the curtain was rung down the members of the company made a rush for Dixey's dressing room to find out what was the matter. There they found Dixey standing in the middle of the floor, with his erratic nose in one hand and a small can of flour in the other. He was reading aloud to himself the printed directions on water and set in a warm place for a few minutes, when the dough will be ready for baking."-Chicago Mail.

Miss Alcott as Author and Woman. Miss Josephine Lazarus publishes in The Century a thoughtful sketch of the career of Louisa May Alcott, the children's author. from which we quote these paragraphs: Strangely enough, in her works, which are the counterpart of her life, her defect becomes a merit, and accounts for their phenomenal success. What was it in Miss Allcott's books that surprised and delighted the children of a score of years ago, and that still holds its charm for the childhood of today? Was it a new world that she discovered-a fairyland of imagination and romance, peopled by heroes and enchanted beings? Far from it. It was the literal, homespun, child's world of today; the common air and skies, the common life of every New England boy and girl, such as she knew it; the daily joys and cares, the

For children are born realists, who delight in the marvelous simply because for them the marvelous is no less real than the view, drawing in nowise upon her invention or imagination, but upon the facts of her own memory and experience. Whether or not the picture, so true to the life as she had lived it, will remain true and vital for all times cannot now be determined.

games and romps and jolly companions-

For the literature of children, no less than for our own, a higher gift may be needed; more finish and less of the "rough and ready" of everyday habit and existence; above all, perhaps, a larger generalization and suggestion, and the touch of things unseen as well as things familiar.

But whatever the fate of her books, Miss Alcott deserves the niche she has won, and the monument built for her in the record of a life which is a protest against the doubts of the age-the fear that duty may have lost its sway and character its foundation, and that happiness is the sole measure and rule of living.
