It isn't safe to believe one-half the reports you read about rich strikes made by those who went to Klondike only last summer. Many of these stories are highly colored in the interest of the transportation companies. These companies have recently raised the fare to Skagway and other points in Alaska and have about the only dead sure thing on making anything out of the stampede to the Klondike. A man who is making a living for himself and family and is established in a good home had better stay away from Klondike. Among the thousands who will rush off to Alaska and undergo the hardships in that miserable climate for the sake of gold, a few only will strike it rich while the great majority will return poorer than when they went. A young man even without family, if he has any prospect at all for employment at home, is a fool to rush off to Klondike and deprive himself of all the comforts of civilization in the search for riches that, in the doubtful event of his obtaining them, may take wings and disappear in a day. The road to Klondike is a hard road to travel, and many who start for that land of golden promise will never reach it. Still, if the writer was not an old man racked with rheumatism and other ills, he would find a way to get there—yes, he would be there now.

The prospects are bright for Hood River having a Klondike next summer in our strawberry crop. The growers will be united in shipping the crop, something that has not happened for several years. And this of itself means better prices. Many sections of country that heretofore have competed with Hood River in shipping strawberries have found so little money in it that they are going out of business. Our Montana markets, for this reason, should be better than for years. The Klondike excitement will give us a good market at Seattle. The trans-Mississippi fair will bring thousands of people to Omaha in time to sample our strawberries, and Omaha will want our berries by the train load every day. Everything seems to be coming the strawberry grower's way this season, and he should make the most of it. The wise man will take the best of care of his plants and help them along in every possible way to increase their yield of superior fruit; and as soon as the ground is fit to work he will set all the plants he has room for up to the first of April. Good strong plants set in the spring, if not too late, will bring returns the same season.

Fourteen department stores in Denver combined to boycott the newspapers to compel them to reduce advertising rates 30 per cent. The fight stirred up the community greatly, the result being that the stores were almost forsaken by purchasers and the proprietors had to surrender or go out of business. Labor unions held meeting after meeting to contrive plans to spread the agitation and keep the people away from the department stores, and the proprietors were finally compelled to pay the newspapers their regular rates for advertising. While the department stores were whipped the newspapers and the labor unions should have kept up the good fight and run them out of business. No combinations of capital are more detrimental to a community than the department stores have proved themselves to be. The fact that they pay starvation wages to their employes and shut out hundreds of smaller stores makes them the deadly enemies of trades unions. All the great newspapers of the country pay good wages, but had the department stores succeeded in reducing the advertising rates of the Denver papers, wages of employes on these papers would also have been reduced, or the newspapers would have gone out of business.

In another column we print the explanation of the Times-Mountaineer, telling why Hood River was not given a place in the souvenir edition of that paper. We believe there was no inclination on the part of Mr. Douthitt to silt Hood River. Evidently the man who was here in the interest of the souvenir edition during our fair didn't work with much zeal. He never called upon the GLACIER, certainly the first place a newspaper man would have thought of calling. The first intimation we ever had of his being here was when we read of it in last Friday's Mountaineer.

Bats are good insect catchers. They fly at night and so does the codlin moth. In Massachusetts, an orchard near an old barn, where 75 bats made their home, the apples were free from worms.

From Our Exchanges.

Every community ought to have sufficient pride and enterprise to furnish the nearest newspaper with the weekly doings in its midst. It is not a task imposed upon them; but a privilege they should make the most of in their own interest.—Lufur Dispatch.

Some time ago a shipment of ore from McCallister's mines on the Ochocho was made to the Tacoma Smelting Works by M. A. Moore, and returns have just been received. A ton of ore was sent and from it $48 in gold and $7.70 in silver was secured and after deducting the cost at the smelting works and freight the sum of $36.44 was realized and Mr. Moore received a check for that amount.—Prineville Review.

School Superintendent Gilbert has returned from Portland, where he has been the past seven weeks, undergoing treatment at St. Vincent's hospital. Mr. Gilbert is much improved in health, and feels that he will be restored perfectly.—Mountaineer.

We understand that Winans Bros. have sold out their property on the Washington side of the river, to the Dalles Packing Co. and intend leaving for Klondike in the near future.—Dalles Chronicle.

Revival services closed Monday night and after running less than two weeks received into their church as members forty people. Rev. C. D. Nickelsen of Moro and Rev. D. H. Leech of Antelope conducted the meetings and proved themselves to be efficient and earnest advocates of the religion, also very forcible and eloquent ministers. With the aid of only a few members of the church at the opening of the services they now have a strong membership. Rev. Nickelsen left for his home Tuesday leaving behind a host of warm friends who will gladly welcome him any time he may come to Antelope.—Antelope Herald.

A Glance Backward.
(Concluded from last week.)
When I again saw the earth, man had begun to tame animals, to clothe himself in skins, to understand the use of fire and to dwell together in tribes. I caught interesting glimpses of Chaldea, Assyria, Media, Babylonia and Persia, as they each gradually unfolded, developed, rose to power and fell into decay, each succeeded in turn by the next, which would in turn carry its development a little further than its predecessor. Last came Persia, who, when she had become mistress of Asia, sent her teeming millions rolling toward Europe. I watched a great Persian army march westward, awaiting as to its destination, until it reached the shores of the Aegean sea, where the brightest gem in all the earth's crown of jewels, the hills and isles of classic Greece, burst upon my view. Alas! I thought, the scourge of Asia is at her doors. Soon there was a marshaling of hosts on the plains of Marathon, and I saw, with wonder and amazement, that great Persian army driven back into the sea by Miltiades and his little army of Athenians. And again I saw a mighty Persian host madly hurling its legions against the heroic little band with which Leonidas was holding the pass of Thermopylae, but only to recoil from each onslaught in that narrow pass with a shattered and fragmentary like breakers against a rock-bound coast. And when the Persians, by means of the traitor's pass, had thrown an army in their rear, I saw the remnant of that heroic little band of Spartans who scorned to fly and would not yield, make their last stand on that heroic mound and bravely give up their lives rather than betray the trust imposed in them by their country, thus leaving behind them a record of undying fame to all after ages. On swept the great hosts, engulfing devoted little Athens and leaving death and ruin in their track. Soon a great fleet of Persia's snake-prancing galleys closed down on Salamis, completely hemming in the small Greek fleet which lay there. But the tiger was at bay, and as I gazed, spell-bound, at the great fleet going to pieces before the furious onslaughts of the gallant Greeks, I was aroused by the voice of my companion, saying, as a slight smile seemed to flit across his countenance, "They seem to have struck hard on the points of old Neptune's trident." But a great army yet remained, and it looked as though the last vestiges of national life would yet be crushed out of the Hellenic race. But now I saw a dense little cloud gathering south of Platae that completely flashed lightning from a fringe of unburnished shields and pointed spears. This was the little handful of yet unconquered Greeks who still defied the great Persian army, and who constantly grew greater from the very desperation confronting them.

On moved the great army, heaving and swelling like a deep sea wave; and I expected to see the resolute little band disappear from sight. But they stood firm as a rock and only slightly recoiled from the shock of the heavier body hurled against them and lost none of their compactness or martial array. Just then I descried the beautiful form of a young girl on a neighboring height. She was clad in white, flowing garments and waved a shining wand above her head as she declared, in ringing accents, "The gods decree that Helles shall be free!" Instantly the cry arose among the Greeks, "It is the Oracle of Delphi!" And as the shout rolled along their bristling ranks, that compact phalanx of gleaming spears dashed headlong into the dense mass of Persians in front of them, which writhed, shriveled and disappeared before them like leaves before the all-devouring flame. But, turning away from this scene of martial glory and horror, my eyes again rested on peerless little Athens, now rising like a beautiful queen in her transcendent glory and purity, as her beautiful temples and stately lay bathed in the rays of a sinking sun; and just as his last rays were gleaming from the burnished point of Minerva's spear that towered above the top of the Parthenon on the Acropolis, my companion intimated that as my wishes had been gratified it was time to depart. "But, pray, explain to me," said I, "the strange phenomena by which I seem to see the actual occurrence of events long since passed away." "What you have seen," said he, "was the actual occurrence of the various events as they were taking place. We have simply outspied the light, and by the quickened sight of the soul have looked upon those things through the rays of light that flashed from the earth at the times of their occurrence." "And you?" said I, much astonished at what I heard. "I was of Helles," said he; "but Apollo awaits me. Adieu." And as a wild, sweet burst of music filled my ears and died away in the distance, the form of my companion was wafted out of sight.
