Man. Whence is this curious creature, Who ruleth earth, called Man? Is he a mortal only,

Or hath he life beyond? Was earth, this mighty planet. That rolls through realms of space, Made for the creature only?

Or was man but made for earth? Such thoughts have staggered sages, From older modern times; They're the questions of all ages, The problems of all times.

The scientific searcher says We came from protoplasm, That thro' countless forms and ages The moneron evolved man.

First from single cells, then numbers, Out thro' fish and boast they ran, Till an anthropold genius Learned of fire and became man.

Be this truth or mere conjecture, Need not shake our sacred trust; Man were, sure, too great a being To forever sleep in dust.

True, the body formed of atoms Will return to kindred mould, But of Soul, the living essence, Ah! the chemist has not told,

Yet, within our throbbing bosoms Something there forever crics, When we shed this mortal casket We may roum the starry skies.
