Cherry Clippers at Work.

The little birds about the size of the thumb, sometimes called "cherry clippers,"have made their appearance. Dr. Day Raffety discovered them in his cherry tree yesterday morning. He threw a clod into the tree and a cloud of the tiny birds issued from the top. a short time they would have materially curtailed the crop. Dr. Raffety says the birds are armed with a bill like a pair of seissors. They attack the flowers midway between bloom and bud, and in s few minutes the ground underneath the tree will be covered with the scissored buds. They are so small that they are hardly noticed, and the great damage they do is attributed to other causes.— Oregonian.
