made a better footing than the snow and was used in preference.

After reaching the top there is a large snow field of several hundred acres to cross as you approach the base of the middle of highest summit, which, being already exhausted almost to the last endurable limit, seems to present an absolutely perpendicular front. In fact, it lacks just enough of being edge of which you must go before you get an unobstructed view of such a sight as Moses may have dreamed of but certainly never saw. In full view were Rainier, St. Helens. Hood, Jefferson, the Three Sisters and two or three others further south, which, in the smoky haze, we were unable to name. A heavy sea of continuous clouds had settled over all the country west of the Cascades through which beautiful Helens had succeeded in thrusting the very tip of her shining peak as it re-flected the glory of the declining sun, and which seemed but a stone's throw away, but far below us. Rainier was more successful as, further to the north, the clouds seemed less dense and its proud contour stood out unobstructed against the western sky.

When our immediate party reached the summit the extremely cold wind that had been sweeping across the mountain earlier in the afternoon, and mountain earlier in the afternoon, and is equal to that which a heavy falling which caused the first party to remain there but a few moments, had subsided, and during the half hour we stayed we were perfectly comfortable. August it is common for large sections of this snow to "let go" and as it rushes through the surrounding country, causing reverberations resembling a thunder storm. When they strike the rocks below snow spray is thrown into the air for hundreds of test in every direction. As we stood near a fusite presure will in the same to the playful antics it sometimes indulges in were being made, and remembered that August was not far away, we suddenly recalled the fact that it was much safer to admire Mt.
