Tive persons are known to have perished on Lewis river, in Washington, where 200 people are left homeless, and many not even clothes to cover them. In Clackamas county, Oregon, many people lost their homes, and saw mills and valuable timber were destroyed.

At Palmer, a Portland man whose name was not learned saved his life only by staying in the mill pond all night. A woman, Mrs. Wood, also spent the last half of Friday night in the pond. The man was a painter, who was employed at Bridal Veil. He was not in the employ of the company, but volunteered to help fight the fire. He was the last to leave, and when he endeavored to find his way out was unable to do so. He swam out into the middle At Palmer, a Portland man whose deavored to find his way out was unable to do so. He swam out into the middle of the pond and got between two logs, where he supported himself until the heat subsided enough so that he could find a way out. The woman waded out into the water until it was up to her neck, and then suffered intensely from the heat from the shore.
