In turning back the pages of history, we find that to ancient Greece must be given the honor of being the first people who instituted the beautiful custom of once each year assembling for the purpose of laying flowers upon the graves and solemnizing, with public funerals, in honor of their soldiers slain in battle.

The inhabitants of the city of Platea, by a decree of the Grecian people, were charged with the honorable duty of pre-paring public games and funerals, for the proper observance of these annual festivals in honor of the dead. It was customary with them, and it is with us today, to select some one of their orators to deliver an address commemorating the deeds of the slain, and to teach the ving loyalty to their country.

Upon one of these memorable occathe of Marathon, where Grecian valor overthrew Xerxes and his Persian barbarisus, Pericles, Athens' greatest orator, was appointed to deliver an oration over the stress of the control of tion over the graves of the Grecians who had lost their lives in the battles of Marathon and Platea, and to show further

HONOR THE SOLDER DEAD,

Memorial day in Hood River was observed by the largest gathering at the cemetery that has ever taken place here. The weather was fine, and many persons with baskets of flowers wended their way to the cemeteries early in the morning. At 9 o'clock the members are minimized and honor to the morning who are the widows and orphans of those of her citizens who had fallen in battle, and many persons with baskets of flowers wended their way to the cemeteries early in the morning. out our country are sheaves reaped in the harvest of death from almost every battlefield of the war, and if each grave had a voice to tell what its silent tenant last saw and heard on earth, we might stand with uncovered heads and hear stand with uncovered heads and hear the whole story of the war. We should hear that one perished when the first great drops of the crimson shower began to fall, when the darkness of that first disaster at Manassas fell like an eclipse upon the nation; that another died of are buried here, and their graves are disease after having lingered long in the decorated with flowers on Memorial hospital; that this one fell in sight of day the same as those of the Union the spires of the revel capital, little day the same as those of the Union soldiers.

Loving friends of those who sleep in Idlewlide had preceded the Grand Army in the work of strewing flowers, and many graves were handsomely decorated.

After the work of decoration, all present gathered at the speaker's stand to listen to the address by the orator of the day. It might not be out of place to mention here that the lumber for or the speaker's each exulting with wild acclaim

CAPTAIN SHAW'S ADDRESS.

Comrades of the Grand Army, women of the Relief Corps and friends of the again fresh in his memory. Once more old soldier, I greet you upon this, the annual festival of our dead, in a spirit the cover of yonder woods and marches of love and fraternity, trusting that you will have patience to follow me in the few words I shall say to you here today.

While I regret that I have not met more of you before today, I feel that I have not met more of you before today, I feel that I have not met more of you before today, I feel that I have not met more of you before today, I feel that I have not met the foe he knows to be strongly entrenched behind breastworks awaiting his coming. With whitened dealy a puff of white smoke is seen to more of you before today, I feel that I have not come among strangers.

Forty years ago we bivouacked on the same camp ground, fought over the same battle fields, drank from the same canteens and shared our last cracker with a hungry comrade. We did not wait for some one to introduce us then, and I don't think we need to do so today. No, the men whose friendship was yealded in the fire of battle need no in. No, the men whose friendship was welded in the fire of battle need no in troduction. The little bronze button you see on the lapel of every old soldier's coat is all the introduction needed when one comrade greets another.

On the 30th day of May of each year the sarviving members' of the Grand Army, remnants of that noble body of men who by their valor saved this nation of ours, blessed heritage to those who will come after us, assemble in the silent cities of the dead throughout the country to strew flowers upon the graves of our departed comrades. We care not what his rank was while in the service of his country, neither do we seek to know what station he filled in civil life; whether he occupied high places of honor, or trod the paths of lowliness, but because he was a comrade, we keep green his grave and honor his we keep green his grave and honor his there is no mistaking that sound; we memory. — had often heard it on similar occasions; We are not gathered here today to tell it is the glad refrain of victory, shouted (Continued on page 4.)

Vaptain A. Winana and Joseph Mayes, drummers, and L. Winana and Master Willie Chandler, fifers. At the cross roads, Officer of the Day A. S. Blowers took command of the procession which marched to the cemetery, the drum corps playing the Dead March. About thirty veterans were in line. The column came to a halt, and the G. A. R. formed in hollow square about the graves of other late comrades, D. H. Clough and Thomas McDonald, where the ritual services of the Grand Army were conducted, closing with the sing of "America." The old soldiers, preceded by the drum corps and accompanied by the Relief Corps, then filed in and out among the graves distributing flowers as they passed the graves marked by flags.

The soldiers' graves were marked early in the morning by Quartermaster L. Henry, The lone soldier's grave in Irving cemetery, that of B. Hull, was flagged and decorated.
