Hood River Glacier.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1903

The Pope Manufacturing company has the thanks of the Glacier for a useful desk pad calendar. Each page contains an expression from an enthusiast in out-door exercise. In their letter fully one half of the writers voluntarily emphasize their belief in the benefits of bicycling for women; all are of the opinion that the most natural and efficient method of taking in Nature's restorer, "The Breath of Life," is by systematic open-air exercise; and that the most fascinating, broadening and exhilerating way of getting this out-door exercies is by means of the bicycle.

George H. Himes, assistant secretary of the Oregon Historical society, Portland, is quite anxious to know when and by whom the block house which used to be at White Salmon was erected. He believes it was during the winter of 1855-56, as a protection from the Indians during the Yakima war. If any reader of the Glacier knows the facts in the case, together with the names of the settlers who built it, they will greatly oblige Mr Himes by sending the information to the Glacier. Every item relating to the settlements along the Columbia river he is anxious to secure.

The members of the Husum grange have challenged Hood River for a competitive fruit exhibit next fall. This will be the date for Hood River's biennial fruit fair, and whoever may be selected to manage the fair must see to it that the people of Husum are accorded space for their fruit and vegetables. They can grow large apples in the White Salmon foothills, and their exhibit will be welcomed at our fair. There will be no favors in the distribution of premiums, and if Husum carries off the big prizes, well and good.

Colonel B. F. Shaw of Vancouver, Wash., will deliver the annual address at the fifth annual meeting of the Oregon Historical society in Portland, December 19. The colonel was a private in the Cayuse war, and a lieutenant in the Yakima war. Amos Underwood served in the same command in the Cayuse war.

The Eugene Register has its linotype installed, and now this progressive morning daily greets its thousands of readers in a brand new dress.

THERMOMETER DEGREES.

The Scale Invented by Newton and Amplified by Fahrenheit.

Why should the freezing point be marked 32 degrees and the boiling point 212 degrees on the Fahrenheit thermometer scale? Most students know that its inventor divided the space between these points into 180 degrees instead of the simpler 100 degrees used in the Centigrade system, but few understand how this number came to be chosen. A writer thus explains the matter:

The thermometer was really invented by Sir Isaac Newton. He started his scale with the heat of the human body and used as his instrument a glass tube filled with linseed oil. The lowest figure on the scale was the freezing point and the highest point boiling water. The starting point of this scale, as mentioned, was the heat of the human body, which he called by the round number 12, as the duodecimal system was then in common use. He divided the space between the freezing point and the temperature of the body into 12 points and stated that the boiling point of water would be about 30, as the temperature must be nearly three times that of the human body.

When Fahrenheit took up the subject a few years later he used the Newton instrument, but, finding the scale not fine enough, divided each degree into two parts and so made the measure between the freezing and boiling points 24 parts instead of 12. Fahrenheit then discovered that he could obtain a lower degree of cold than freezing, and, taking a mixture of ice and salt for a starting point, he counted 24 points up to body heat. By this measurement he obtained 8 for the freezing point and 53 for the boiling point. His scale now read: Zero, freezing, 8; body heat, 24, and boiling water, 53. It will be noticed that this scale is identically that of Newton's, only starting lower and having the numbers doubled.

It was with this scale that Fahrenheit worked for a long time, but finally, finding the temperature divisions still too large, he divided each degree into four parts. Multiplying the numbers just given by four the thermometer scale now in use results.

The chance choice of Newton of the figure 12 to represent the body heat determined the present thermometer scale, even as the yard, foot and inch measures originally came from measures of parts of the human body, and as the width of a railroad carriage was determined by the track, which in turn was determined by the width between the cart wheels necessary to bear a load which could comfortably be drawn by a mule.—American Inventor.
