Beveral papers very properly observe that any part of the Willamette valley can pro-duce apples as good as those of Hood River. The trouble is that at Hood River everybody aprays and the orchards are well cared for, while in the valley horsabouts it is the excep-tion for this sort of care to prevail. Hence the wormy apples. The moral is plain

The fact of the matter is that the foregoing clipping is not only mislead-ing but untrue, and no intelligent hor-ticulturist would dare risk his reputation on such a statement. To illustrate : Recently the writer was at Vancouver, Wash., and in company with a Mis-souri friend drove out to Fruit valley near Vancouver, where the country is covered with prune orchards. While driving along, my friend, who had visited Hood River, asked why these people did not raise apples instead of prunes. My reply was that they could not produce a good apple, so on in-specting a prime dryer and its stock, I asked the owner, a man from Maine. specting a prune dryer and its stock, I asked the owner, a man from Maine, if he could produce the Spitzenberg. His answer came quick and positive. "No, it is impossible to grow a Spitzen-berg here. There is so much moisture that the worms will breed faster than you can extinguish them, besides the climate otherwise will not put the color on them nor furnish the keeping onalities." there were more Lan Smiths here the country would be better off. qualities

The Willamette valley could improve on their present quality of apples, but never in a thous-and years can they compete with the Hood River product. The members of the Independent

The members of the Independent The members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows are planning to build a hall at Odell. We heartily welcome such a move, and only hope they will succeed. Such an enterprise will add another link to the chain of prosperity of Odell district. The pres-ent hall was not intended for public use, and the only motive the owner of it had in suggesting a conference with members of the lodge was that a public hall seemed a necessity. It can, howhall seemed a necessity. It can, how-ever, be put to a more satisfactory use, and the new one will be welcomed by the owner of the one already built.
