HOW THEY PICKED HOPS AT YAKIMA

Hood River, Or., October 11.—Editor (Glacier): We have just returned from a five weeks' outing in a tent in the Yakima hop fields, and wish to tell those who were lucky enough to stay at home the delights of the trip.

Learning from Mr. Gribble that they could reach the Elk Beds, which are but five miles from the Inn, with a team, they determined to go, and accompanied by Mr. Gribble, had a delightful moonlight ride, with Hood in view all the way.

Then some one would pick on a fresh supply of brush, and for a time the interest in the game would cause all else to be forgotten until growing darkness brought on a new lot of fuel.

As it grew near morning the white men would disappear one by one, but the Indians remained until the next day at noon, when hunger drove them and their patient ponies home.
