As a good many have enquired in a suspicious manner as to the nature of the mixture that may be seen being used in the ice manufacturing process, we will state for the information of the public that it is no devil's cauldron or has no connection with the imp of Satan who is employed in this office. The brine that is used in the ice manufacturing process is weakened by the condensation of water or steam in the pipes, and it is necessary to evaporate the water occasionally by boiling, and also to add more salt. This is done in a vat, in which a fire is built underneath.
