FLYING MACHINES FOR GOVERNMENT

Far more severe than any other nation is the United States in its requirements in the matter of flying machines of heavier-than air type, as set out in the specifications issued recently by General Allen, chief signal officer, upon which inventors are invited to submit bids to be opened February 1.

This machine must carry the two persons of combined weight of 300 pounds and sufficient fuel for a flight of 125 miles. It must be designed for speed of at least 40 miles an hour, but a machine will be acceptable of only 36 miles an hour, although only 60 per cent of the price will be paid therefor. There is provision for a premium on speed in excess of 40 miles an hour, so that at 44 miles the machine would cost the government 120 per cent more than the contract price.

The hardest requirement to meet and one never heretofore realized by any inventor, is that before acceptance a trial flight will be required for at least one hour, during which time the flying machine must remain constantly in the air, without landing.

Unless the bidders are also the makers of the flying machine, they must state the name and place of the maker. They must also supply a complete scale drawing of their devices, and they are notified that it is desirable that the machine shall be capable of being easily and quickly taken apart and reassembled, and be transportable in an army wagon.

To protect the department from irresponsible and visionary persons who set up claims to the invention of practical flying machines, bidders will be required to furnish with their proposal a certified check to the amount of 10 per cent of the machine's cost.
