"WINTER KILL" STILL A MYSTERY

Prof. H. S. Jackson, of the Oregon Agricultural College at Corvallis, spent several days in the valley the last week investigating the various Hood River orchard problems. As he left Friday for Corvallis he said that he had made no new discoveries of particular interest. During this visit, Prof. Jackson observed especially the cause of the so-called "winter-kill" disease which he ran across in various parts of the valley. He said that this disease was more of a mystery than ever and it would require several years observation to ascertain the exact cause and nature of the trouble. Last year there was a heart rot accompanying the scars on the bark of the trees, which was supposed to be either a cause or effect of the latter. Prof. Jackson said that this year the heart rot was not present in many cases where the tree seemed to be effected. A number of trees which seemed to be stricken with the "winter-kill" were not leaving out this year while they did not seem to be dying at all. Prof. Jackson said that a number of the Hood River orchardists had reason for believing that some local orchard conditions might be responsible for the trouble, but other orchardists would be holding opposite conditions for the disease so that there was no agreement on local causes. Prof. Jackson regretted the fact that the experts were able to spend so little time in Hood River to watch this disease. He said that Dean A. B. Cordery expected to visit the valley in the near future.

Wanted—A Conservation Cook. There is conservation in water power, timber, minerals and habits but as yet no recognized conservation in cooking. Why has the man who chops down a tree received so much attention and the cook who chops pounds of home and flesh and fat from the roast receive so little?

No one questions the enormous and wanton waste in the improper regulation of coal and lumber lands, but if the daily waste that goes on in the millions of kitchens throughout the land was piled alongside it, what well informed housewife or patient auditor of the household accounts would dare to proclaim the former of greater proportions?

A certain investigator recently spent three weeks in New York city looking over the ash dumps and garbage cans in the residence districts and made the startling announcement to Mayor Gaynor that the cooks of New York threw away enough nourishing food each day to supply 10,000 people with proper sustenance.

Mrs. Elizabeth Hillier, the Chicago cookery expert, in a recent statement that the women of France or Germany, by the application of economical and intelligent methods, secure from 20 to 30 percent more food value from the similar cuts of meat or kinds of vegetables than do their American sisters.

The time then is ripe, the clarion notes of opportunity sound for the coming of a Pinchot—or a Mrs. Pinchot—to keep the nation from the devastations of dietetic waste and ignorance. Of course there are mighty obstacles to be overcome. It is much easier to deal with a tree chopper or a land grabber than a cook—it is also safer—but the need is here and the champions of a comprehensive public economy should not be deterred.—Spokesman-Review.

The Evolving Farmer. (Portland Journal.) That was a notable gathering of farmers, and other people, recently, at St. Louis. From its various proceedings we may learn the important fact that the farmer is rapidly evolving into a business man in a broader, higher sense than he has been. He is not only learning how to use the soil better, but to raise larger and better crops, to farm scientifically and shrewdly, but he is becoming, as he never was before, an all-round, wide-angled business man.

In the future, the progressive farmer will know the markets about as well as the astute speculator does, and will raise and market crops accordingly. Why not? He has his daily newspaper, rural delivery, probably a telephone, the most up-to-date implements and cheap literature on all farming subjects, and is able to produce twice what his father did, and
