STATE WILL ASSIST IN PHEASANT RAISING

For the purpose of restocking the state with Reeves' and China Pheasants, the State Fish and Game Commission has made a three-year contract with Gene M. Simpson, Corvallis, Oregon, whereby Mr. Simpson will give his exclusive services to the state, as well as the use of his excellent equipped game farm. Simpson's success in the rearing of wild game birds guarantees the state against any possible loss. The rearing of wild game birds suggests an industry that is practically unknown. Raising pheasants is difficult than raising poultry yet it is far more profitable. In the same measure that everyone fails to succeed in the latter will the facts demonstrate that there is a wide market for pheasants, and the demand originates in all parts of the United States. Under the Oregon law, pheasants raised in captivity, whose wings have been pinioned before they are able to fly, may be sold directly to the consumer, providing permit to ship alive is secured from the State Game Warden. The state is willing to co-operate with those who wish to raise pheasants, even to providing the guide, instruction as to rearing and personal attention when required. Reeves' Pheasants bring $25 for a trio, consisting of one male and two hens. China Pheasants readily sell for $2.50 for cocks and from $3.00 to $4.00 for females.

MACHINE THRESHERS WATERMELON SEED

The threshing of the watermelon crop is no joke to some enterprising farmers throughout the country who have learned that raising this crop solely for the seed is profitable. This is made so by the use of modern machinery for the purpose, thereby reducing the labor to a minimum. A Kansas farmer expects to secure 50,000 pounds of seed from the watermelon acreage on his farm this season, an acre of the melons generally producing about 200 pounds. These are sold to the seedmen, who pay about 12 cents a pound and retail them at nearly that much an ounce. To separate the seed from the melons the latter are run between revolving cylinders which crush them, and the pulp is carried along through a revolving drum which sifts out the seeds. After being washed and dried they are then bagged for market. The pulp is a waste product, good only for yellow jackets and the like unless effectively disposed of by other means.

The Small Farm.

Many are the arguments for the small farm. It puts many a family on the land, who leave the close air and crowded tenements of the city for a healthy open air life. It opens the way for the thousands of townsmen who have saved or gained some hundreds of dollars to go to invest in a secure livelihood that is not cut short by advancing years. It makes of every inch of such a family an independent citizen, his own master, undisturbed by labor troubles or business vicissitudes. It fits the vacant spaces in a community with producers and consumers. It secures for every member of the family common interests and ambitions. It removes the growing children from the temptations of city life. It provides for the family nutritious and abundant food. It gives leisure and pursuits for country tastes. The limited area of the small farm requires that all of it should be cultivated to the utmost, and, in the aggregate adds immensely to the food products of the nation. The census tells us, however, that although there are 6,340,000 farms in the United States, the food supply especially in meat, is not keeping pace with the growth of population. What- ever the advantages of the small farm it is obvious that the farm of 10 or 20 acres gives no scope to the raising and handling of sheep, cats, cattle, etc. It may well be that the day of the open range and of the far reaching ranch is passing fast. But it is not a necessary consequence by any means that the investment of money and brains in the large farm is losing an attraction it ever had. The more the new science of farming spreads the greater scope is given to the efficient working of large areas. More costly machinery and equipment, a higher class of instructed labor, investment of larger sums in stock, better arrangements for sales and purchases, regular accounts for keeping—in fact the treatment of the farm as a factory, the development of business aptitudes—this will justify the investment of every dollar that the modern large farm costs. Mr. Hill's advice should be ever kept in mind. Diversify your crops, and increase the number and quality of the stock you keep.—Portland Journal.
