BONNEVILLE HATCHERY NO HIGH WATER INTERESTS VISITORS

taken care of at the hatchery in 1911.
Twenty million eggs will be hatched and reared during 1912, and the final total capacity of the plant, when nurs-ery ponds now projected are com-pleted, will be 41,000,000.

"The former capacity of the hatchery was but 8,000,000 eggs. Acting nder instructions from the state board of fish and game commissioners, Mas-ter Fish Warden Clanton had constructed a flume which has a capacity of 23,000 gallons per minute, or the minimum flow of Tanner creek during the summer months. This is the stream which supplies the hatchery with water from a quarter of a mile up the creek to near the hatchery outldings, where it is liberated into a series of ponds, flowing from one to kidneys the other and forming a series of casare nursed and fed from the time they are old enough to be removed from the hatching troughs until they are liber-

Greenman, the present superintendent, who was then inspector of hatcheries, personally delivered the first lot of eggs at the hatchery. They were taken ten days before the plant was ready for operation, and it was therefore necessary to hold them in cold storage at the Union depot at Portland for that length of time. They had been brought from the Salmon river racks.

"Though the Bonneville hatchery is "Though the Bonneville hatchery is the principal one at present, it was not the first one established in the state. The first one was built in the early 80s near the mouth of the Clackamas river, and was operated jointly for a few years by the state and gov-ernment. It was finally abandoned and the lower river cannerymen erect ed a hatchery on the headwaters of the same stream.

The milk is washed off the eggs taken to the hatchery, where they are sorted with nippers, until the third day, after nippers, until the third day, after which they are allowed to rest for ten days or two weeks. The eggs are then sorted daily and all the dead ones removed to prevent the starting of a "At last I used Bucklin's Arnica Salve, and was completely cured." Cures

During the early stages, the fish are confined in great numbers in very small spaces, but as they grow they are thinned out and the longer they are kent the greater spaces required. are kept the greater space required to handle them. It is the plan of the present administration to hold them until they are about a year old, when they are marked and liberated.

The present system of marking is to clip aV-shaped piece from the gill cover. At first glance it will probably seem like an impossible task to undertake the marking of a few millon fish of the fingerling stage. According to Superintendent Greenman, however, one man can, with the use of an in-strument invented by Master Fish Warden Clanton, mark about 2000 fish in a day. The purpose of the marking is to determine more or less accurately the percentage of fish which are perthe adipose fin. It was found, how-ever, that this fin often grows out and in cutting it off there is also danger of About 70,000 salmon fry thus marked were liberated from the Bonneville hatchery in September, Six weeks after Master Fish Warden Canton made a cruise down the Columbia river and had no trouble in finding the marked fish in practically every eddy along the stream, down as far as the mouth of the Willamette.

The salmon are supposed to attain maturity at the age of four years when hey return to the rivers to spawn. With the exception of the steelhead which is generally conceded to be a trout, the salmon die after they have spawned. Making no effort to return to the sea or to take food they gradually die of starvation or wear selves out on the shallows of the stream headwaters. The sleelhead returns to the sen, however, when he is able and comes back to spawn in suc ceeding years. So far as is known, the oldest steelhead ever taken was seven years old. This is determined by counting the rays or lines on the fins, by the aid of a microscope, but as this was but recently discovered, the extent of the observations is very limited and the theory has not been per-

According to Superintendent Green-man, the old system of liberating the fry when they are about one inch long, resulted in a return of from two to three per cent, according to the best estimates obtainable. Under the plan now being tried by the state the young of keeping fish until they attain the "ingerling" stage, which is reached at about one year of age, it is hoped to increase the percentage of return to fully ten per cent. It is believed that by keeping the fry until they are four or five inches in length they will be better able to get out of the way of their innumerable natural enemies and also able to secure a better food sup

One of the most interesting sights between here and Portland on the O.-W. R. & N. line is the state hatchery at Bonneville. A number of Hood River people have recently visited the hatchery, which now has at its pools several million trout for distribution this summer.

In all probability no high water will be experienced from the annual rise of the Columbia river this summer. At any rate this is the opinion of the river people have recently visited the ermen of The Dalles, who from past experience are able to make a fairly good estimate of the situation, says the Optimist.

The following article from the Oregonian deals more particularly with the process of hatching salmon eggs at Bonneville.

'Improvements and additions recently completed make Oregon's central state hatchery at Bonneville the largest in the world. A total of 15, 800,000 salmon and trout eggs were mild weather continues it is thought taken care of at the hatchery in 1911.

In addition to the office and exhibit rooms, it contains 240 16 foot troughs with a capacity of 180,000 eggs each, or a total of 41,000,000. This building and the hatching troughs are supplied with a pipeline flowing 1000 gallons per minute.

"No eggs are taken at this hatchery. They are secured from the government and from some of the collecting stations in different parts of the state. At these stations the streams are racked and the fish held until "ripe." The salmon are then taken from the water and killed.
