High Street Light Charges Save Seattle Plant From Deficit.

In the July issue of Public Service, a leading article calls attention to alleged discrimination in rates between customers of the municipal electric plant, and states this discrimination can only be stopped by putting city owned light plants under the state public utility commission.

The article also calls attention to the high street light charges (almost double those of Spokane and Portland, where private companies operate) and says that the plant would show a deficit if the street lighting charge was not so unreasonably high.

It is of particular interest to find these conditions in Seattle, for here is one of the best opportunities in the country to conduct a successful municipal plant. There is abundant water power. It is cheap. Part of the development cost is met by the water department, which sells the water after it has been used to make electricity.

Yet what do we find? We find that these men are handicapped on the one hand by councilmen who see that six-cent electricity catches votes, even if it does not pay bills.

The excessive street lighting charges in Seattle constitute the fly in her municipal ointment, just as you will find a similar fly in the ointment of all plants which boast of extraordinarily low rates.
