Ohio Apples Scarce

No article on the market is causing dealers generally more trouble than apples, says the Delaware Gazette. The crop this year is very small generally, but Delaware is considered fortunate because surrounding the situ ally, but Delaware is considered for-tunate because surrounding the city are a few orchards, all too few at best, where smudge pots were employed to combat the late frosts. From these there is a small crop, the earliest of which, it is stated, will be exhausted this work which, it is stated, will be exhausted this week.

Under the new laws, the product must be sold by the pound, and the retail price is now four pounds for 25 cents. Figured at the old bushel rate, this makes the prices 75 cents a peck or three dollars a bushel, a price not seen before for apples except much more out of season than now. Local dealers do not hold out a cheering prospect for very much better prices in the later apples, and there is every indication that many an apple lover will have to content himself either with a flat pocketbook or a lessened satisfaction this fall.

Even with this the apples that are being offered are but a second or third grade. Some orchard, which ordinarily produce hundreds of bushels, will not have even the first multiple of that amount for sale this year.

THE FORTY-SEVENTH PARK, SAYS VISITOR G.A. R. ENCAMPMENT

Professor C. S. Sargent, of Massachusets, considered the wolrd's greatest authority on trees, and a leader second only to Gifford Pinchat in the conservation movement, was in Portland last week. He was accomanied by Judge Charles Stratton, former president of the Boston park board, and Byard Thayer, of Lancaster, Mass.

Professor Sargent prefers that his siddress be given as Arbortum, Mass., for it is here that he is the directing head of the greatest collection of trees and shrubs in the United States, if not in the world. This is Harvard university's "tree school,"

Professor Sargent came to Oregon on what would probably be considered an eccentric mission.

The Picca Breweriana, or weeping spruce, which is native to southern Oregon, is just now at its best. He deisred to see it and came clear across the country, with his friends, for the purpose. This is not the first trip of like nature that he has taken. He will gather specimens of the Picca and endeavor to transplant them in the Arboritum. There is one specimen in the city park which is alive, but which is not growing very well.

"There can be no adequate reason why Mount Hood should not formally be made into a national park, 'said Professor Sargent. "This should be done now before the forests are taken away. The lumber value of the trees on the slopes of Mount Hood is nothing compared to its value as a park asset.

The people of Oregon will always be sorry if they do not insist that Mount Hood be made into a national park with roads about its hase that will permit access to the scenic wonders that I am informed exist there.
