CORVALLIS IS CITY OF VAST INTEREST

Because of the interest the Oregon Experiment Station and the department of horticulture of the Oregon Agricultural College have taken in the development of the fruit industry of the Hood River valley and because of the annual large attendance of local boys and girls at the great state college, Hood River folks are probably as well acquainted with Corvallis, the home of O. A. C., as the population of any county in the commonwealth. O. A. C., is a name so frequently heard here and so often are faculty members and experiment station officials among the apple growers of the valley that most local citizens, even though they have never been near the thriving Willamette valley city or browsed on the great campus, think they know all about the town and college.

It takes a journey down into the heart of this great Willamette valley, with its 5,000,000-acre agricultural empire, to get a rational conception of the magnitude of the landed wealth lying in northern Oregon between the Cascades and the Coast range or to know from personal touch the importance of O. A. C. or the progressive enterprise of the residents of Corvallis, among whom for nine months each year nearly 4,000 of our own boys and girls and those from some 38 other states and 15 foreign territories and nations reside. A leisurely visit to the campus of O. A. C., strolls up and down its wide avenues and an inspection of its lecture halls, laboratories and workshops and a chance to read with an understanding the following foreword of a recent booklet issued by the college.

"What charm and color the old familiar campus gave to our college life! What memories it stamped upon the parchment of our minds!

"Like mirrors, men and women reflect their surroundings. Mind and body give back the impressions of the immediate environment. The Greeks created a beautiful natural beauty. The Italians, under limp skies and in a clear, soft atmosphere, developed a genius of line and color. The New Englanders, on their 'stern and rock-bound coast,' evolved a character of relentless and substantial nobility. The people of the vast plains acquire a freedom and breadth of movement unknown, and often uncongential, to the dwellers in more crowded quarters. Aspirations cling about the mountain top, and majesty inhabits the drapery of the shore.

"A college campus often becomes the dearest remembrance of a lifetime. Like home, it calls to the imagination of the youth who has once learned to love it; and through all his later years becomes a hallowed shrine of recollection. With the change of season his heart goes out to it; and in times of annual reunion his steps turn toward it as the sailor's toward the sea.

"The Oregon Agricultural College has a beautiful campus. Though only thirty-five years have passed since the campus knoll was selected and the cornerstone of the first building was laid, those years have been rich with the associations that make a campus interesting and with the changes that give it dignity and charm. Honest sacrifices have made its acres precious. The losses of two wars have sanctified it. Dramatic crises that have threatened its existence as a campus have reared up noble champions in its defense. And thousands of students, having blessed it by their best endeavors while they lived here, have successively gone forth from its gateway dedicating their lives to the purposes for which it stands and the ideals it has taught them to uphold."

A visit to this great seat of learning, which is by no means just a cow college, as so many, who have no real acquaintance with its curriculum or purpose, seem to think it, should be taken by every citizen, and more especially by those who are taxpayers. An earnest, close study of the history of O. A. C., will reveal that it is one of the leading institutions of its kind in the nation, and that its affairs have been administered with exceeding economy, despite the onslaughts that have been made in recent months by demagogues scouting to arouse antipathies and secure votes of the unwary.

The 15th annual convention of the Oregon State Editorial Association was recently held at Corvallis. It was really an O. A. C. affair, for the visiting newspaper men were billeted at Snell Hall, a magnificent new woman's dormitory, and the sessions of the meeting were all held in the college library. The visitors were dined and feted at Waldo Hall and in the banquet room of the Domestic Science building. They had an opportunity to move for a time in the college atmosphere. Many of them inspected laboratories and shops, cow barns and poultry yards. They saw how O. A. C. combines practice and theory. They began to realize why it is a center of learning that indicates a higher and more sensible form of citizenship. They returned home determined to help fight its battles.

Corvallis owes much to the state at large because of the circumstances that have placed one of the nation's greatest colleges in its confines, but no citizens of the state realize this more keenly than do these selfsame Corvallis people. When one stops to give analysis to the situation, it will be seen that the task, for a comparatively small city, to keep pace with an institution of higher education of the magnitude of O. A. C. naturally presented some problems in local taxation and finance. Corvallis citizens were beneficiaries of the huge annual sum spent from state appropriations and by students, but they might have been selfish; they might have taken as much as was available and have given a minimum in return. This was not the Corvallis way. The town, without ostentation but in a substantial manner has built along with the college. It is the second fastest growing city in Oregon, its population now reaching 6,000.

Corvallis has no slums and the foreign element is conspicuous by its absence, most of the residents being native Americans of the better class. In addition to the usual business enterprises, there are 11 churches, four of which have very large buildings; a high school with over 500 students; three grade schools; three banks, with combined deposits of over $2,000,000; three creameries; a sawmill, brickyard, cannery and flouring mill; a semi-weekly and a daily newspaper; 10 miles of paved streets; pure spring water piped from the mountain; auto park; live commercial club; strong fraternal societies; women's club with 500 members; and the best fire department in the state college erected two large buildings and extensive additions to three others; one is now in the course of construction and others planned to accommodate the evening stream of students. A $75,000 theater, $50,000 hospital, three business blocks and scores of substantial residences complete the year's building program. One hundred thou-and dollars is being expended to improve the water system and a dozen blocks of streets are being paved. The Methodist church is to construct a $100,000 edifice and the Church of Christ one costing around $40,000 next year. All these public and private improvements, together with others being planned for, will increase the price of property there and the desirability of Corvallis as a place to live and engage in business.

Provided the local motorist travels by way of the Base Line road, Gresham and Powell Valley and thence to Oregon City, Corvallis is less than 150 miles from Hood River. A jaunt down to this seat of learning is a journey worth while for any Hood River motorist. Except for about a mile and a half on the Base Line road and the 12-mile distance from Albany to Corvallis, the entire 150 miles are now paved. These macadam stretches a little rough, especially after the fine driving over paved highways, will soon be improved.

A journey to Corvallis, which will carry one across the finest section of the Willamette valley, extensive berry tracts near Salem, hopyards, where the trellised vines will soon be filling with blossoms, wheat, oat and barley fields and dairy farms on a scale impossible in the mountainous valleys, such a trip, by its very contrast with the wild grandeur of our own highlands, is soothing and restful to the local resident. Just as the Willamette valley resident, although he may know of the superb quality of the Hood River apple, will never have a comprehensive idea of our intense methods of cultivation, until he comes here to feel the real appeal of our charming small valleys and the closeness of our mountains; just so will we never sense the magnitude of the Willamette valley or the greatness of its actual or potential wealth until we tour there among its residents. Instead of hieing off to seacoast or mountains for the entire time, it will profit us to spend at least a part of the vacation period studying the "biggest valley."

The general idea seems to be that the Willamette valley grows hotter than our local summer time climate. In reality it is cooler. During the week of the editorial association convention, it was almost too hot for comfort here, it was cool enough at Corvallis and Salem for an overcoat when motoring after dark.

Oregon's great system of motor highways, it is true, have been built as a lure for the motor tourist from other states, and they are finding these paved boulevards, too. If you do not believe it, get out and count the foreign cars you will run out of figures on the California visitors alone. But we of the home state have not benefited by them as we should unless we put them to full use, visiting around among ourselves. Such journeys are leaving. They take the conceit out of us. We learn that ours is not the only hospitality, that our industries may be dwarfed by those of citizens of some other counties. We shuffle out from under the cloak of sectionalism and learn how to consider state problems from a broader statewide viewpoint. The Corvallis convention of the Oregon State Editorial Association in a large measure exerted just such an influence. And besides, the members of no state organization ever had a more enjoyable time, for the Corvallis citizens and members of the faculty of O. A. C. seem to know how to make their guests fill to overflowing each moment of their stay. They were quietly and unobtrusively busy all the time supplying entertainment features, and that Oregon city, at future conventions, that allows the state's editors to depart for their homes after greater pleasures than were theirs at Corvallis is going to merit a special decoration.
