A TRANSIT DREAM OF 28 YEARS AGO

The following communication, first published 28 years ago as the date line will indicate, is interesting when one considers how great has been the progress in transportation since that time: Hood River, Ore., Nov. 20, 1895.

Editor Glacior: I had been reading of the great advances of modern science in the direction of means of rapid transit, both by land and water, and also of the yet unsolved problems of aerial navigation, and falling into an idle reverie, I wondered if the time would ever come within my short period of existence when I should be able to traverse a flying steamer and visit remote quarters of the globe as easily as I would now mount my horse and ride a dozen miles.

While gazing here and there, a sailing vessel or two in the distance, while off to the right seemed a tremendous outburst of volcanic fire in the distance islands of Hawaii. And sweeping over the Pacific we were again hearing "home." I now turned again to the pleasant old gentleman whom I had accepted while passing over Persia, thinking that he had no doubt forgotten his promises to me, when I noticed that he was intently gazing at one of the mountain peaks of the Cascade mountains, and speaking first he asked me what we called that white cone rising off there to the southeast.
