HOOD RIVER, OREGON

Bill, a huge mascot tom cat at the Hood River Market, dropped through one day last week with his nose out of joint. A. F. Davenport had just received from a taxidermist a mounted hybrid Lynx bobcat, caught in a trap last winter by Ives Scheer. The stuffed cat, mounted in a crouching position, a life-like snarl on its lips, was set atop a showcase.
Bill entered the shop and was proceeding with his usual agility when he happened to see his eyes aloft and note the features. Paws and pinstriped fur were stretched to hear the domestic cat's meow as he backed backward for the door. His tail was erect and the hair on his back was bristling. Bill seemed to regain his courage when he was once outside. He started boldly, in a right way apparently, to re-enter the meat shop. His courage, however, again failed him when he had another good look at the fierce expression of the crouching wild cat. He turned tail and fled precipitately.

Ed Wright and his son, Floyd, who operate traps and nets and set traps the past week preparing for the beginning of the open season on salmon Tuesday. In the vicinity of Cascade Locks 18 fish-whoops were made ready to drop into the water.
The first night's fishing of the open salmon season on the mid-Columbia Tuesday proved lucky for Ed Wright and his son, Floyd. The latter removed nearly a ton of giant chinooks for his net, and the father was set for behind. The value of the fish caught during the night was over $400.

City Dog Taxes are Due
City Marshal Hart yesterday began his annual drive for municipal dog taxes. Dog-owners here must pay a tax of $3 for males and $5 for females. City officers, after May 1 each year, pursue the rigid custom of impounding dogs on which the tax is not paid. The state dog tax is not being rigidly enforced here this season, only about seven of the estimated 400 owners of the county have paid.
