PRISONER WALKS OUT OF CITY JAIL

H. L. Cooke, who was thought to have escaped from the city jail last Friday night through a hole that he whittled in a plank wall of corridors, really went over on the top of the jail to freedom. It was ascertained after an investigation.

Cooke, who was given the run of the jail corridors, is thought to have obtained the jack knife used in cutting the hole in the thick boards when he walked through the jail office, picking it up from a table, where personal belongings of prisoners was kept. Apparently he hid behind the tier of steel cells, and when Constable Olinger took other prisoners to breakfast about 7:30 Saturday morning, thinking that Cooke had escaped through the hole in the wall, the latter, after he had gone, walked boldly through the office.

The escaping prisoner met City Water Superintendent Clark, telling him that he was returning to the jail after a business trip to Washington.

"I knew the officers wouldn't let me go over on the top of the hole," he said. "Now I'm back, but I'm afraid they will not let me have any breakfast. I'll go out and get some," and he left before the nonplussed water superintendent could comprehend the situation. Mr. Clark telephoned officers at once, and a search was begun for Cooke, but no trace of him was discovered until early in the forenoon Saturday when housewives reported that a man answering his description had been seeking food.

The insecure condition of the jail corridors, which it is declared were supposed to be of concrete, according to the plans of the city hall, where the jail is housed, has aroused citizens, and it is likely that improvements will be made in the prison.

Not only do the wooden walls offer prisoners an easy avenue of escape, it is said, but they form a dangerous fire hazard.

Cook, who had been held from justice court here on a charge of forgery, had escaped indictment, the grand jury having found a no true bill. He was being held in jail, however, for Portland authorities.

Cascade Locks Wants Union School

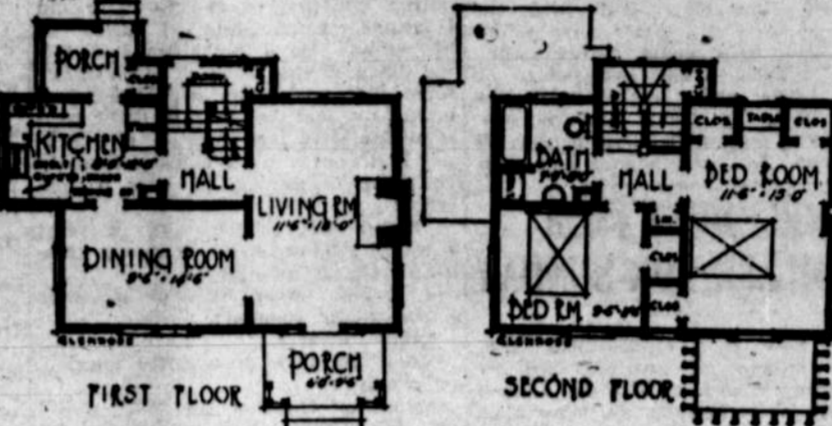

The proposed inclusion of the Wyeth school district, along the Columbia River highway west of here, in the new union school district comprised of the lower Hood River valley may come to naught because of the revival of plans for a union high school at Cascade Locks.

A committee, composed of W. D. Trotter, of Wyeth, and Capt. Charles Nelson and R. M. Hamill, of Cascade Locks, the latter superintendent of schools there, visited school authorities here yesterday to apprise them of the revision of the Wyeth plans. It is proposed not only to include the Wyeth district but a portion of eastern Multnomah county in the Cascade Locks union high school district. Mr. Trotter said Wyeth was favorable to the Hood River plan until the Cascade Locks proposal was announced.
