SOIL MANAGEMENT FOR UPPER VALLEY

(By Gordon G. Brown)

Now is a good time for fruit growers to decide definitely what course to pursue this coming year with reference to soil management. This should be carefully considered before a decision is arrived at. The age of trees and possibilities for their growth are factors of greatest importance; also former soil management and its relation to present fertility.

As a basis for discussion, it is generally agreed that a good study of soil is one of good tilth, moisture holding capacity and with an abundance of organic matter or humus as it is called. This is the storehouse from which the essential life giving growth and production may be drawn. Good or poor results are proportionate to the measure of which these fundamental qualities are present or absent. There are several essential differences between growing conditions in the upper and lower valleys which the writer believes of sufficient importance to warrant emphasizing. With reference to orchards in the middle valley and at Parkdale, the shorter growing season is the outstanding feature. This varies from ten days to two weeks ordinarily. This difference is of course mostly attributed to a higher elevation. Furthermore the red shot (Parkdale loam) of the upper valley is distinctly different from that occurring in other parts of the valley. It is also apparent that irrigation water when applied to the land is relatively more beneficial in the (snow and ice) from which it comes.

The aim of fruit growers on the higher elevations should be to adopt a plan of soil management that will lengthen the growing season, and soil activity. The soil in the upper valley can be made to warm up in the spring, the better. This starts tree growth off more promptly.

During the past two years the writer has made a study of the Hood River soils to determine the character and percentage of plant food. As a general statement, it is correct to say that soils in this district are well supplied with phosphorus and potash. In this connection it is emphasized that applications of such fertilizers have not been productive of tangible results in our orchards. On the other hand, available nitrogen continues to be a limiting factor. This is much less so now than in former years when exclusive clean cultivation was practiced. Most of our soils have been wonderfully built up as a result of various cover crops. Chemical analysis of various Hood River soils show a fair percentage of nitrogen.

There is need for "speeding up" soil activity in the upper valley. This is apparent as trees become older and the tendency towards smaller apples more pronounced. Even on the better soils relatively early cultivation should be practiced for the purpose of opening up and warming the soil so as to hasten and intensify the oxidation of organic matter. By so doing, bacterial activity is assisted and nitrogen made available. In this connection it is emphasized that no matter how rich in plant food soil may be, the matter of availability is dependent upon conditions which assist or retard bacterial activity, temperatures and oxidation.

Let the grower keep in mind that his soil should be a maximum of organic matter, but which also favors maximum tree growth. We feel that as between hairy vetch or alfalfa, the former is much superior as the two or now being handled by the average grower. Alfalfa is often used on account of its deep rooting habit and its ability to break up an impervious subsoil. As a general rule, upper valley orchard land is loose and friable and this consideration is relatively unimportant. One of the chief drawbacks to the growing of alfalfa in the orchard as a permanent cover crop is the fact that relatively little or no cultivation can be given for at least two years after it is planted. In the meantime unless the trees are heavily fertilized with nitrates they begin to make poorer growth. It is a matter of common knowledge that several upper valley orchards have not responded well under the influence of alfalfa even though this shade crop has been present several years. As it becomes older, it is susceptible to more thorough cultivation than when young and where this is done, trees greatly benefit. Very often this essential cultivation is overlooked entirely or else a dull disc is dragged indifferently over the alfalfa stand once each spring. Even when properly cultivated, the tendency for alfalfa to grow quickly and densely shade the ground. The result is relatively early in the season and thereafter the ground has little opportunity to warm up. Where practically ice cold water is flooded over orchards thus handled, it is evident that there must be a slowing down of soil activity due to shade and to water.

The annual seeding or reseedling of hairy vetch in early spring is consistent with a better system of management. The ground is put in first class shape for a seed bed. Providing early seeding is accomplished the need for heavy irrigation is relatively less during the initial stages in the development of this crop. This means a warmer, more active soil. Furthermore, during early summer the stand is small and the ground much more exposed to the sun than where a dense stand of alfalfa is present. This also means a warmer soil. When planted early it reseed itself each fall, but where seeded late or the summer, little seed is formed. Its chief value lies in its production of an abundance of organic matter and its adaptability to an intensive orchard soil program.
