There is a tendency, however, on the part of the motor journal, and more especially, as is apparent from the dictatorial attitude, on the part of the president of the Oregon State Motor Association, Joseph E. Dunne, to overstep worthy aims and to set themselves up as sole interpreters of all methods of applying constituted law.

It is not infrequent that one finds public servants puffed with their own importance and conducting their affairs in a manner so dictatorial as to be offensive to the citizenry. Mr. Dunne seems likewise puffed with power of position. We have made it a recent task to observe the methods of enforcing traffic rules by Hood River officials, and we do not believe our officers have overstepped the bounds of courtesy and common sense. In view of actual facts, a recent article in the Oregon Motorist, signed by Mr. Dunne, is nothing less than an insult, not only to the people of Hood River county but to the people of Oregon.

Mr. Dunne brands himself as a law violator, when he, by his somewhat impassioned words, tends to incite motorists of the state to a boycott of Hood River county.

The decision in the Johnson case should point to a new way of action on the part of the city in street improvement. The days of indiscriminate application of an assessment to shelling property for street improvement are over. In most instances the streets calling for improvement today, at least such is the case in Hood River, are along some arterial motor traffic route. The improvement, it is true, will be of general public benefit, but in numerous instances the property assessed cannot be sold for as much as the assessment reaches. In such cases the courts will prevent the application of a general fund.

Hood River should by charter amendment make possible the improvement of such streets by appropriation of a general fund. Hood River has a water supply sufficient to enable it to get by during the dry days of mid-summer, but laws are crying out, and garden plots show the lack of irrigation water. We want to have water in volume enough to permit the constant sprinkling of lawns and gardens.

But the future of our water supply is comparatively unimportant when we take cognizance of prevention of fire. Hood River today is well protected, provided our system remains intact, and no trouble occurs in load-gauging mains. But there is now a law before these authorities upon whom rest the responsibility for fire protection a serious worry. The problem of more water for Hood River is the most serious now confronting the municipality.

The typical motor visitor to Grand Falls and Johnson county, such as were Oregon visitors last week, gave the impression that this section of a great commonwealth is due to forge ahead.

The Scopes case, so far as the lower court of Tennessee is concerned, is over, and the defendant has been fined $100 for violation of a state law. From the standpoint of legal principles and inhibitions of the Constitution, the Tennessee law seems a good law. But as a matter of public policy we believe the adoption of such prohibitory laws have their most serious effect that their most serious proponents desire. The mere adoption of such a law settles nothing. Laws never have, they never will and cannot control matters of conscience.

We have heard some compare the Tennessee law with the Oregon school law. They are not on all fours, as an attorney might say. If the Tennessee law had gone to the extent of prohibiting entirely the teaching of evolution in Tennessee, it would have come in conflict with the Constitution, we believe, and would have failed for this reason. As it stands, the Tennessee law is merely regulatory of the curricula of the Tennessee public schools.

As to an individual's fundamentalism or his belief in evolution, we have no quarrel, nor should any man. I have a right to follow to the end the dictates of my conscience in such matters, and you yours.

How far are the proponents of fundamentalism and evolution going to carry their fight? Mark Sullivan says the battle is to be re-acted in congress. Will we have to face it in Oregon? We hope not. Such contests are creative of intra-community upheavals that leave wounds, hatreds and general disruption.

There is need for a journal, such as the Oregon Motorist, published monthly by the Oregon State Motor Association, in educating authorities of various counties toward a courteous and considerate treatment of tourists in their home states, our visitors, in their home states, are governed, perhaps, by rules of the road that are entirely different from our own. Our duty may be to educate. There should be an effort on the part of Oregon motorists to extend visitors late arrivals of law, or to render their terms, which are sure to infect the food which they handle. All these methods are good, and in certain communities keep the typhoid fever rates down to a very low level. When we travel abroad, however, we are more apt to contract with typhoid germs. The spring that we camp by may be polluted; the farmer who sells us our milk may be excreting typhoid germs, and includes a few billions of them per quart. Even at home we can contract with typhoid germs in a milk can, when an unclean carrier is employed as a cook. What can we do under the circumstances? There is another way besides avoiding the germs, by taking the fight to the enemy and strengthening our bodies against the germs, so that we may not develop the disease even if it gets in.

A person who gets typhoid fever develops resistance to the germs. If he didn't, he'd never get well. This resistance power stays on for some years, and keeps him from getting typhoid fever again during that time, even though he should swallow the germs. It's the same sort of immunity that is produced by many other diseases. The body, however, does not distinguish between live and dead germs, when it starts fighting. In other words, it will fight dead germs, and thereby develop its resistance power, just as it would live ones. The dead ones, though, cannot multiply and produce typhoid bacilli under the skin. Thereby we fool our bodies into thinking that they have live ones to fight. The main idea is to be able to resist live ones when they do meet them.

The fight of the body against the dead germs sometimes produces a little fever, but the great comfort of knowing we are protected against typhoid easily makes up for that. This typhoid "vaccination" is valuable at all times, but especially so when we contemplate a camping trip. If we take it every three years, we keep ourselves protected against all ordinary chances of getting the disease. Typhoid vaccination was mainly responsible for the great drop in the number of cases from the Spanish-American to the late world war, with about 200 cases per 1,000 soldiers annually in the former and one-third case per 1,000 per year in the latter.
