NEW DISCOVERY SAVES FRUIT TREES

The following article, which appeared recently in The Daily Californian, publication of the student body of the University of California, may be of great interest to local orchardists. The clipping was forwarded here by Prof. H. B. Langille, member of the U. of C. faculty, who stated that further information can undoubtedly be secured from Dean Eppman.

The article, written by Fred C. Foy, a student, follows:
Thousands of fruit trees now being pulled out and thrown away as useless

all over the country may be saved and brought back to full bearing through a discovery made lately by Dr. C. B. Lipman, professor of plant pathology in the university. His treatment consists of injecting chemical solutions into the tree trunks, and is regarded by agriculturists as one of the greatest advances of the last quarter century.

Nor is Dr. Lipman's system a matter of theory, for it has been tried and proved a success. During the past year 300 lemon trees of an up-state orchard were successfully cured of chlorosis by the injection of ferrous sulphate into their trunks. The entire group is now thriving and as healthy as any of the trees in the entire grove.

Tree injection, states Dr. Lipman, has been tried for many years but due to defects in apparatus and the chemicals used has formerly been unsuccessful. In the present system a hole is bored about three-quarters of the way through the trunk to be sure that the conducting tissue is tapped. A glass tube is put in the hole and sealed in place with a specially prepared wax. A small rubber hose is attached to this tube and carried to a bottle of the solution at about the height of the tree top. Under the mild pressure thus produced, the ferrous sulphate solution is fed into the trunk of the tree.

Further experiments have shown it possible to increase the bearing qualities of a healthy tree by injecting magnesium nitrate. Another phase of the work consists in eliminating insect pests such as aphids through the injection of a solution of poison not strong enough to kill the trees, but deadly to this insect pest.

advised a college of the form finally established. Later, as first president of the board of trustees from 1904 to 1920, he played an important part in the development of the present school. Dr. Elliot was for many years pastor of the first Unitarian church in Portland. He is now living with his son, Rev. W. G. Elliot, the present pastor.

FAIRBANKS SHOW COMING NEXT WEEK

Douglas Fairbanks has dramatized the old saying, "A bull in a china shop."

Those who view his latest United Artists Corporation film feature, "Don Q, Son of Zorro," at the Elko theatre next Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, will see to what length this disciple of activity goes in his quest for screen thrills.

In the midst of a very dashing little duel with one of the numerous villains, a most ungentlemanly bull comes galloping into the scene, disrupting the aplomb of the duelists. The crowd of 800 extras scatters, the villain gets excited, falls over his sword in the path of the bull, and from then on things happen with a large amount of rapidity. Just how Douglas rescues the villain from the bull forms the big thrill of the picture.

"Believe me," Fairbanks said when it was all over, "I've had a bit of excitement from time to time making photoplays, but this caps the climax. That bull charged me four times. For one day, that's plenty!"

The bull used was imported from Mexico. He was the wildest of a herd being raised for the bull ring in Mexico City.
