

VISIS No. 3. BUILDING RESISTANCE

PROF. ALLEN K. KRAUSE, M. D., Johns Hopkins University Medical School, Baltimore

MAN is the only animal that habitually and unnecessarily uses his bodily functions to excess-in overwork, overplay, overexercise, overworry, in prolonged mental and emotional stress, in unnatural hours of activity without rest. And being organized into communities, men herd together and thus establish continual contact with one another and become unduly exposed to one another's infections.

In most men's bodies are little growths of tissue called tubercles in which lie concealed the germs of tuberculosis. These tubercles form spherical walls around the germs, called tubercle bacilli, and thus imprison the germs. As long as the wall is strong and unbroken the germs cannot spread; they cause no illness and are no more to be feared than a common wart or a mole in no iliness and are no more to be feared than a common wart or a mole in

If the tissues around the tubercles function normally, these walls ten to remain strong and so tight that few or no bacilli can make their way out of them and spread throughout the body. But too prolonged activity of the bods as a whole, or of the part in which may be the tubercles, will in general bring about conditions that favor the weakening of the tubercle wall and the emergence of bacilli.

We heal tuberculosis by rest—of a knee, of the lungs, of the whole body. We become ill with tuberculosis by reason of overstrain. Other diseases, especially those that cause inflammations and congestions in the lungs, whip up the physiological activities of the body and throw a strain upon the walls of tubercles. So do certain bodily activities, like repeated and long-continued work without sleep, pregnancy, childbirth, dissipation, etc.

The point where activity becomes overstrain is an individual affair. The miner, the broker, the farmer, the school teacher, might every one of them become fatigued by the other's ordinary labor. The phlegmatic and the irritable, the beefy and the wiry, respond very differently to the same stimulus, whether this be play, labor, exercise or dissipation. Every man's olnt of fatigue is his own, registerd in his own consciousness by sensations and all have experienced. Every rational man knows when he is tired or experience soon teaches him what will make him tired. And no rational man should push himself beyond this point unless he must,

To reduce exposure to all infections to a minimum and to balance one's activities so there will always be a healthy surplus on the credit side of rest, nay, more, a good reserve to draw upon in time of need-this is building up resistance. At thirty we build it a little differently than at twenty, at forty again differently than at thirty; there is a different proportion of is; yet principles and details remain the same.

Food, clean air, adequate clothing, decent hours of sleep, conserve and promote health—the normal body. But the normal machine was built for one man power and a too persistent effort to squeeze out more will sooner or later mean an overheated boiler and outworn gears; rusted, roughened and thinned out metal, and then—the collapse or the explosion. Then may an insignificant little tubercle become ablaze.

Tole desire to extend to you the compliments of the season and express our sincere wishes for your prosperity the coming year with a continuance of the cordial relations existing between us.
