

The Ideal Bristle Brush Apple Wiper

It would be superfluous for us to impress further on the orchardists of this section the necessity of preparing a pack of Apples free from arsenical spray residue. THEY MUST BE CLEAN, if we expect selling organizations to handle them.

Our new IDEAL WIPER, equipped with bristle brushes, will clean out the stem and calyx ends thoroughly.

We will only make a limited number of these machines this year, and it behooves you to place your order at once if you wish the advantage of this equipment, now a packing house necessity.

THE MATTHEW GRAVITY CONVEYOR CO.

For which we are Oregon State Agents, is placing on the market this year a new conveyor, with wheels spaced five inches apart and set diagonally, which allows the box to travel very smoothly. The new Conveyor is of standard construction, with the same hook up as on former years, with electrically welded cross braces, which have been found exceedingly rigid.

Get in touch with us, or our representative, MR. A. B. COOPER, who will demonstrate the equipment. Inform yourself of our prices. They will save you money. Last of all remember the

IDEAL CRADER

These are increasing in popularity, for they fit the needs of the Apple grower. A cordial invitation is extended to all to visit our new factory, where you may give a thorough inspection to what we have to offer.

KNOCKS AND BOOSTS

By W. H. W.

There has recently taken place a more or less heated discussion by a number of Oregon newspapers in regard to what may be called the political ethics of newspapers which endorse or recommend candidates in advance of the direct primary. The Oregonian, Eugene Guard and Baker Herald headed a group of newspapers that took the stand that they were perfectly within their right and privilege in endorsing a candidate owing to the importance to the state of securing the nomination and election of a representative in the United States senate of outstanding integrity, energy and abilities. And for the additional reason that an effort is being made, it is declared, by a faction in the Democratic party backed by the Democratic press to nominate the weakest Republican candidate for senator, namely Robt. N. Stanfield, in order to strengthen the chances of electing a Democrat to the senate from Oregon.

Opposing the attitude of the Oregonian and its supporters are the Oregon Journal and the Salem Capital Journal, both of which, listed as independent in politics, are supporting Bert E. Haney, Democratic candidate for U. S. senator.

The Corvallis Gazette-Times, although a staunch Republican sheet, has also criticized the Oregonian and other party organs for the stand they have taken in the matter. Other Republican newspaper editors who lack the courage, it is said, of the editor of the Gazette-Times have expressed themselves as favoring a policy of "hands off" until after the primaries. The newspapers which are for a free hand in the primaries are supporting the candidacy of Frederick Steiwer for senator, believing him to be best qualified for the position. The argument of the anti-papers is to the effect that in order to carry out the true spirit of the direct primary law there should be no boosting of one candidate over another by the public press for nominations. That in fact its hands should be tied and its mouth gagged.

Leaving Mr. Steiwer, Mr. Stanfield and Mr. Haney out of it, what we are concerned with is the freedom of the press. Where is the law, written or unwritten, restriction, regulation, rule, understanding, tacit or otherwise, that the press violates, breaks off, fails to observe when it sees fit to endorse a candidate in the primaries as being the most worthy for the office to which he aspires, provided this action is taken honestly and in good faith? I do not know of any, neither does anybody else I have consulted. Getting right down to brass tacks, the primary election is the more important of the two and it is high time that the press, as it is doing to some extent this year, get into the game and use its influence in an attempt to weed out the unworthy, the over ambitious and the unfit. Oregon and other states need a new deal and a different type of man than some of those who are representing them at the national capital.

many years these notions of physical attractiveness held sway. But alas! these good, old notions have sadly changed. Just what kind of indentation of the physiognomy or physique of the present day man is looked upon as super attractive apparently has not been announced, but we are told by the beauty bonanza that the dimpled knee now holds first place in the dimpled line with ladies of culture and fashion. Yet fashion is fickle and one wonders just in what part of the human anatomy the elusive dimple will next be considered the most beautiful.

There are few country estates but what would be dignified, embellished or made more attractive to not only their owners but to passerby by being identified by a name. Unlike many city home properties where so many of them are alike or very nearly alike, country places where they are reasonably well kept up have a touch of individuality that easily lends itself to bearing some suitable designation. In sections of the state, more particularly in the Willamette valley and in Multnomah county, this custom has become quite prevalent and adds much to the attractiveness and interest of the many tourists and others for that matter passing along the highways in these districts. Of course there are those who own country homes and scold at the idea. They describe it as "putting on dog," but nevertheless the idea is growing more popular and has come to stay.

Readers with red blood and thoughtful minds cannot peruse the story appearing in the Glacier of the early days of Oregon written by Mrs. T. R. Coon without paying a tribute to the intrepid men and women whose heroism stands out like beacon lights in those troublous times. In these days of luxurious transportation, convenience of communication and generally prevalent soft methods of living one wonders how many men and women would endure the hardships of those pioneers and whether if they attempted to do it they would consider it worth while. It is not in our thoughts to belittle them. The better half, able to switch on the electric stove with one hand while reaching for the telephone with the other and hubby equally able to pull a chain from his bedroom to turn on the furnace heat or call the janitor to heat the carpet, would probably say, "I don't see how they did it. Why, they didn't even have a delicatessen store or a barber shop nearby."

Nowadays we hear much about one-piece dresses and other articles of women's wear in one-piece that are generally thought to be unmentionable in the news columns of a newspaper or in polite society although perfectly permissible when displayed in all their detail in a page advertisement. Retiring to the one-piece dress, however, as much as it is being touted as a distinct innovation it is not altogether a new idea. In the mountainous districts of Kentucky, North Carolina, West Virginia and some of the other nearby states in this region, where it becomes exceedingly torrid in the good old summertime, where long green is almost as scarce as hen's teeth, where visitors are few and far between, where life is simply lived and where even the shades of the dress of fashion fail to reverberate, the one-piece dress, ay, the one-piece costume, has been in vogue for many years. Twenty years ago and more it was not unusual and it probably is not now, to see the female members of a family in this region in the summer months arrayed in nothing but a calico dress. How do I know? Well, I have two perfectly good eyes and there was no immediate attempt at concealment. Grandmother, sitting on the slant porch, smoking a corn cob pipe, mother with a hoe in the scanty corn patch, and bonum daughter heading a half dozen razor back hogs away from an asparagus garden, were all attired in these so-called one-piece garments, plus bare feet. One other article of wear adorned the women of the family who were out of doors, namely, sunbonnets of the most ancient design and so voluminous in size as to completely hide the identity of the wearer.

The one-piece dress therefore is not new. It is old. Older even than this period, for if we go back to the cottages of the ladies of Greece and Rome we find it in the fashion of that time, but with the entire ensemble not quite so abbreviated as the mountain women alluded to above. Reference to the simple summer garb of these women of the hills would probably not be complete without a slight description of the attire of their men folk which was almost as near the zero mark, as it consisted of a two-piece suit—a pair of home-made jeans and a hickory shirt, also the product of the freestone sartorial artist. The prevailing style in summer footwear for men was the same as adopted by the ladies. Since the coming of the coveralls, that masterpiece of the clothier's art, the complicated two-piece suit for men who reside where moonshine and hollow stumps meet, may have been sidetracked.
